The Famous and Delightful

HISTORY

OF

FORTUNATUS,

And his Two SONS:

In Two Parts.

PARTI. Containing an Account of his Noble Birth, Travels and Adventures, in many strange Lands; how he came by a Purfe, which always supplied him with store of Mony, and a Wishing-has, that caused him to be in an Instant at any Place he desired to be at; how, at his Death, he bequeathed his Purse and Has to his two Sons; with his pompous Funeral, Monument and Epitaph.

PARTII. Containing the Travels and Adventures of Andologia and Ampedo, Fornionatus's two Sons, with their untimely Deaths, Burials and Epitaphs.

The Sevenib Edition, Muserated with Pictures, and many pleasant Stories added, not being in the former Impressions.

London: Printed by and for T. Norris, at the Looking-glass on London-bridge.

12410 220,

EX.

The Travel, Fortunatus poorly goes, But foon by Fortune's Help in Riches flows:

Here Andologia, in Furfact of Fame, Of a Purfe is cheated by a Princely Dane.

The Famous and Delightful

HISTORY

OF

FORTUNATUS,

And his Two SONS:

In Two Parts.

PART I. Containing an Account of his Noble Birth, Travels and Adventures, in many strange Lands; how he came by a Purfe, which always supplied him with store of Mony, and a Wishing-hau, that caused him to be in an Instant at any Place he desired to be at; how, at his Death, he bequeathed his Purse and Hat to his two Sons; with his pompous Funeral, Monument and Epitaph.

PARTII. Containing the Travels and Adventures of Andologia and Ampedo, Formulatus's two Sons, with their untimely Deaths, Burials and Epitaphs.

The Seventh Edition, Mustrated with Pictures, and many pleasant Stories added, not being in the former Impressions.

London: Printed by and for T. Norris, at the Looking-glass on London bridge.

Y SIOT SILE

VERHATIVA

THE

Contents of the Book.

N Cyprus Ifle liv'd Theodorus fum'd, In a fair City Famogofta nam'd; Everavagane and wild be frent his Store, That by Excess be grew fo wond'rous poor, That Fortunarus all the Sons be bad, Was forc'd to wander a kind Fortune led; When oft be Death and Danger did efcape, Encountring Bears, or worfe, in humane Shape? When as by Chance be did Dame Forune meet, Who bim (loft in a darksome Wood) did greet, Gave bim a Purse that he should ne'r be poor, And bid his Sons likewife poffels the Store: With this be roves the Werld from Coast to Coast. Leopoldus bires, who kills the faithles Hoft, To Cyprus returns, bis Parents dead, There builds a Palace, and a Wife does med 3 Leaving two Sons again to Travel bent; When in ftrange Countries fixteen Years be Spent ; Returning from the Soldan King does bear A Has (which wifbing) bears him through the Air. Returns (and dring) to his Sons bequeaths His Hat and Purse, and all their Vertue leaves, Ampedo eldest, Andologia next, Their Mother dies with Grief fo fore perplexe. When Andolocia wieh the Purfe does roam, And mild Ampedo stays content at home.

The CONTENTS.

After much Fame acquir'd in Princes Courts, To England Andolocia strait resorts, And Spends bis Time in Feafting and in Sports. Till Agripina's Beauty proves a Snare, And makes him whence his Riches flow declare. When, whilft be is with Drowfiness opprest, He of his Purse a quickly dispossest. Then from by Brother he conveys the Hat. With which, after much Toil, the Purse be got. The Princess is to Theodorus wed, Young Cyprus Prince, and to the Court is led. There Andolocia by his Martial Feats The Envy of some envious Nobles gets, I bo' in a Wood at bis return do flay Hi Men and him in a deep Dungeon lay: Bereave bim of bi Purfe, and then his Life For which swo Earls did die to end the Strife. Ampedo bearing of bis Brother's Death. Burns bis fwift Hat, and then refigns bis Breath?

> Gave bim a Parle that he from a re't le port And led bis Sons liberife politische Serven

> > Leaving two Integral to he

THE

THE

HISTORY

Originated the serious of the seriou

FORTUNATUS.

The first part.

asb.

Of the Parentage and Birth of Fortunatus.

of Cyprus, lived one Theodorus, deficended of noble Parentage, who, by the Decease of his Farher, had a plentful Estate fell into his Hands, but he being of a haughty Mind, gave himself wholly up to the Pleasures and Vanity of the World: He associated himself with the great Men of the Country, and Vived riotously, spending his Time for the most part, in Gaming, Hunting, Hawking, and fumptuous Entertainments, the which in a fhort time greatly diminified his Wealth; which his Friends perceiving, and being much griev'd thereat, thought there was no better way to restrain his licentious manner of Life, than by matching him to a Wife: This being resolved upon, and he not contradicting the motion, they fought for a fair, young, and vertuous Lady, throughout all the Cities of Cyprus, and at laft, in Nicova, found one that well liked them, the being Daughter to a wealthy Merchant, and adorned with all the Perfections that appertain to Womankind, her Name being Gratiana; to this Lady, by the Consent of her Father, Theodorus was shortly married, and for a time lived in great Splendor, the first year having by her a fair Son, whom they named Fortunates; but this little or nothing restrained his Extravagancies, infomuch, that in a short time after the Marriage. notwithstanding the large Portion he had with his Wife, he was brought to extreem Poverty, which made him repent, though now too late; fo that oftentimes being hunger-pined, and in great want, he looking upon his Son (who by this time was grown a comely Youth) would figh and let fall Tears, which fo afflicted the young Man, that he one Daydemanded the cause, defiring

t I. The Pillop of Fortunatus: ng, defiring to know whether he had offended ich him in ought, the which, if he had, he his would firive to amend it: To whom the ng, forrowful Father replyed, he had never ofzht fended him; but it was the exceeding pehis nury, to which by his Extravagancies, he ng was reduced to, that made him figh. To IPwhich the Youth teplyed, Let not that on, trouble you, for as for me, I have received tusuch good Education under you, that I can Cy-Shift for my self in any Place of the World one but he perceiving his Father Itill troubled ter and always figh when he looked upon him. ith he conjectured it was for his fake, and Votherefore resolved to be no longer chargeato ble to him: Whereupon one Day taking er, his Stick in his Hand, he went to the Sea-1 2 fide, where he had not staid long, but a ear Gilly put to Shore, in which was the Earl niof Flanders, who was returned from Jerning falen; they had not been long afhore to reich, fresh themselves, but the Earl caused the ge, Trumpet to found, to call his Men back inhad to the gally; which Fortunatus perceiving, me and being defirous to travel, went to the ugh Earl and offered him his Service: When the Earl perceiving him a goodly Youth, eing okand having by Sickness, loft two of his Was Men by the way, he entertained him; when and as the Earl and all his Servants being on ung board, they fet fail, and in a short time ule, arrived at Venice. ring

CHAP, IL Topo hi mid How Fortunatus departed his Country, and how he became greatly esteemed by the Earl of Flanders.

Fter some Contests with the Winds and Sea, the Gally fafely arrived at Venice, where the Earl and his Men landed; and there, by the help of Fortumatus (who amongst all his Men could only fpeak the Language) he bought rich Jewels, and gold Imbroideries, in order to his marriage, he being to wed the Duke of Clevis's Daughter at his Return, to whom he had contracted before his Departure. By thefe, and fuch other Services, Fortunatus gained the Love of his Lord, infomuch that the rest of the Servants began to envy him. while after, the Earl coming into his own Country, bought all his Servants Horses, and gave to Fortunatus the best next that himself rod on; so that it greatly grieved the rest of the Servants, who wished the Devil had had the Italian before he came into their Lord's Service. A while after the Marriage being celebrated, a great Number of Nobility being present, Tilts and Justs were prepared; where, after the Nobles had done great Feats, the Earl fet up two Jewels valued at a hundred Pounds, for the Servants who should do best; upon which Part I. The Diffory of Fortunatus.

Fortunatus prepar'd his Horfe, and foon, with his Lance, joverthrew one of them

dert in thind of that run against him, whereupon he icarried away the Prize; then one Timothy having won the other Jewel, the Servants urged Timothy to just with Fortunatus, who should have them both; but in the Conflict Timothy was borne down Horse and Man, fo that Fortunatus got not only all the Jewels, but the Applaule of the Spectators, and the great Favour of the Earl, who highly praised him; whereupon the Nobles and Ladies gave him many Prefents: This more and more raised the Malice of his Fellow-Servants against him: but when they well perceived that they could do nothing against him fairly, they Wroughe iles mid-

rt K and Earl

inds ived Men rtuonly vels,

had efe, ned the

les, hat ved the me the ber

les wo

ch tu-

The biffar of Fortunatus. Part I. wrought by Subtilty; for there being 2mongst the rest, one Robers, an ancient Servant to the Earl, who promised for ten Crowns to make Fortunatus run away; to this they gladly hearkened, and every one paid his Dividend most joyfully: When this was done, he infinuares himself into the Company of Fortunatus, expressing more than ordinary Kindness, carrying him abroad to Treats, and other Merriments, without fuffering him to pay ought; this Fortanguarimagining to proceed from the intire good Will he bore him, he gave the greater Credit to all he faid, not peceiving his Subtilty: When the Money was almost spent, and the Servants began to put Robert in mind of his Promise, he one Day taking Fortunatus into a private Apartment, after feveral Discourses, he began to figh and look fad, which Fortunatus well noting, demanded the Caufe, who told him it was for his fake; then was he earnest to know the Reason: Truly, faid Robert, it - was sold me by my fingular good Friend, who upon a great Penalty enjoyned me Secrecy; but for the Love and Good-will I bare to you, I shall reveal it : Then thus, Our Lord intends to morrow to ride to Laufon, to wage Law against the Earl of St. Paul; where for the fealoufie he had lately conceived of his Chamberlains, lest they should have carnal

Copulation with his beauteous Wife, or any Part I. The Willey of Fortunatus. of her fair Ladies and Gentlewomen that attend her, he is refolved to have all gilded: and though be entirely loves you above any of his Servants, yet be cannot serve the reft fo while you take part with them in the fame. you being the chief Chamberlain, and the mast comely among it them; after which, he will only reveal it to his Lady, forbidding her to reveal it; but as the manner of Women is, it cannot be expedded that she will keep the Secret long; so that it being seread abroad, it will redound to your atter Diffrace, if the cutting do not hazard your Life. This I learned from him who is appointed to geld you, he telling it me, (as thinking I might be one of the Chamberlains) in requital of some fingular Favour I had done him. When Firtunatus heard this, he looked as pale as Death, and defired Robert by all the Ties of Friendship, that he would be assisting to him in making his Escape, For, said he, I awould not be gelded if my Lord would give me bis Effate. When he talked of Flight, the Hypocrite Robert feigned himself sad. and defired his Stay, the better to perfuade him into a Belief of what he had related; telling him he was forry that ever he had imparted ii to him : But Fartunatus standing as it were upon Thorns, thought every Hour ten till he was gone; then Robert bid him, in what Peace foever he refided, fend him & Letter, that when the Earl WAS ten

. to one

ien

ito

ng

im

ts,

he

be ng

oft lo-

ay

nt.

m

to it bo

7;

to rd ge

0

is

NY

was supplied with gelded Men, he might give Notice to return. But Fortunatus replied, he would never return, though he endured never such Necessity or Want. Upon this Robert inwardly rejoyced, and helping him to a Horse, he rod out of the City as if he went a hunting, and having passed the Gate set on full speed, and never looked behind him, till he thought himself out of Danger, and purchasing another Horse, he sent back the Earl's, lest upon that Account he might be perfued.

CHAP. III.

How the Earl grieved for the Departure of Fortunatus; and what befel him afterwards.

came to the Earl's Ear, but he was exceeding forry, musing with himself what should be the Cause, but when he could think of none, he demanded of his Servants if they were privy to the Occasion of his Departure; but they denied they knew ought: Then he examined his Lady and her Gentlewoman who were there at the same time, saying, That the Evening before he was very pleasant, and had discoursed to them about several Affairs of Women, and other things; at which the Earl marvelled the more, saying, Although he could not them irt I. Part I. The DiRday of Formatus. 9 ight then learn the true Caufe of his departing! 1 ICwithout taking Leave of him, he doubted h he not but that he should find it out, and he lant. would severely punish the Occasioner of it. and This terrified Robert, fo that he grew very the melancholy, left any of the Servants hould ving betray him: And thereupon he took an oath ever of Secrecy of them all, and when they imwere importunate to know by what means left he had effected it, he told them a Story of his Father's Advancement by the King of d. Cyprus, quite contrary to what he had practised. But to return to Fortunatus: Fortunatus being on his way, made what speed e of he cou'd to Calice, where espying an English ter-Ship, he bargained with the Mafter to transport him to England, where arriving, he came to London and there happened in-11 145 to the Company of two young Cyprus Mer-W2S chants, who were fent over by their Fathers with a Ship laden with very coftly Wares, hat uld for which they had received great Sums of ents Mony. And now Fortunatus being expert his in the Manners and Cultom of most Counew tries, became, as it were, their Tutor and and Instructor, so that they spent beyond meathe measure, rioting it all the Day at Taverns, ore and at Night sporting it with Harlots, each to one striving to out do the other in Excess; ind nor was Fortunatus wanting to ipend aed mongst them, but within a while, all their net Mony being spent, their buxom Lasses fornen fook fook them, and their Jollitry came to an End; which made the Merchants bethink themselves of returning home; which they did in the same Ship they came in, though with heavy Hearts and empty Purses, leaving Fortunates behind them.

C.H A P. IV.

How Fortunatus became a Servant, and bow one wicked Andrew by murdering a Gentleman in the House of Fortunatus's Master, brought the whole Family in great Trouble.

Portunatus being bare of Money and in a strange Country, knew not well what Course to take, but at last resolved to get over into France, but wanted Mony to pay

Part I. The Difford of Fortunatus. aiff. his Passage; when going to a Harlot, on 0 an hink they ough had

whom he spent the greatest part of his Mony, he defired her to lend him two Crowns, telling her, that he was to go over Sea to fetch four hundred Crowns that his Uncle owed him, but the would by means lend him any, nor fcarcely make him drink, but fent him away with Flours. Then feeing his former Folly, he wished, (though too late) that he had kept his Mony, and not have fpent it upon fuch an ungrateful Baggage: so that not having Money to pay for his Paffage, he betook himfelf to the Service of one Jeronimius Roberti, a Florentine Merchant in Lombard ftreet, where he lived with great Credit, pleafing his Mafter beyond measure by his Diligence and Towardness, and, in a short time gained not only the Love of his Mistress, but of all the Servants, infomuch, that his Matter not only intrusted him with all his Can, but employed him in his main Affairs, as taking in his Merchandize, and other things of fecret and weighty Concernment, whereby he not only gained himfelf, but also by his faithful Difcharge of the Trust committed to him, he greatly advantaged his Maflet, infomuch that he became dear to him; but he had not long continued in this Service, before an extravagant Florentine came to his Mafter, whose Name was Andrew, the Son of a very responsible Merchant, who

t

lea-

and ne a reat

12 The history of Fortunatus. Part h had been fitted out with a Ship, and all manner of Merchandize, the which he had fold and imbezled at a lavish rate; and thereupon was driven to extream Poverty, which obliged him to live by his Wits; fo that bethinking himself, he counterfeited Bills of Exchange, and by that means so drained his Father of what Monies he had, thatfin Expectation of what should be returned by Merchandize, he utterly impoverished him; the which when he parceived, and that no more Money was to be had, he betook himfelf to Shifts, and being at Bruges, the Place where he had fpent the greatest part of his Mony, he began to bethink himself that it was in vain for him to return, by reason of the great Injury he had done his Father; and then again confidering that those whom he spent his Mony upon, began to flight him, and that he could neither borrow any, nor be trufted for fuch convenient things as were appertaining to the Supply of Nature, he much condoled and bewailed his fad Condition, whereinto by reason of his Extravagancy he was fallen, and refolved whatever bery'd him, to return to his Father, when in his Travels homeward, he came to the City of Turin, in France, where by his Hoft, he understood that a Merchant of London, upon a spiteful Accusation, lay in Irons in a dark Dungeon, and that he being very rich, would plentifully Part 1. The Differ of Fortunatus plentifully reward any one that would go over into England and Solicit his Bufiness, fo that he might be delivered. At this News Andrew rejoyced not a little, and thereupon ask'd his Hoft whether free Accels might be had to this Merchant? To which the Holt answer'd, that for a small piece of Mony he might fo prevail with the Keeper as to admit him to the Speech of that Merchant: Whereupon he resolved to make the best of his time, preparing a Ducket for that purpose, for which the Keeper joyfully let him in: When he was entered the Prison or Dungeon, by a Light that he had with him, he espied the Merchant, who lay fast fetter'd in Irons. to whom he addressed himself in English. upon which the Merchant was not a little over joyed, asking him if he knew fuch and fuch Perfons, among whom he named Ferranimus Roberti, to which he replied, that he not only knew him very well, and had been acquainted with him in England, but likewife in the City of Florence, then he thewed him the Cause of his Imprisonment, which was, for forging the King of England's Pass port, defiring him, out of all Love, that he would speedily repair to London, and thew unto his Friends in what a fad Condition he lay, and how pitifully he had been handled fince his coming into that Prisonand to defire them to follicit his

rt Fi

had ereerenich

hat Ills

tlin

n;

no m-

he

elf

by

at er

64

he

nd

by

n,

6-

in g-

A.

V

44 The Dinozp of Fortunatus! Part r. his Enlargement, for which he would not only, think himself infinitely obliged to him, but he would reward him with five hundred Crowns. At this welcome News Andrew did not a little rejoice, fo that taking some Monies of him to bear his charges, he departed, promising to do his best in order to his Delivery, and thereupon took Shipping for England, and coming to London, he made it his Bufiness to go from Place to Place to the Merchant's Friends, as also to the Court, where he understood he could not be released unless he payed a Fine of three thousand Crowns, the which Feronomius Roberti promifed to lay down upon Security: So that Andrew going from Place to Place to enter into Bonds for the Sum, at last understood that the King having married his Daughter to the Duke of Burgundia, relotved to make her a Prefent of the richest Jewels that might be got, having already caused his Jewellers to make them, and deliver them to a trufty Knight, - who was appointed to convey them to her. At this Andrew inwardly rejoyced, and, now -despairing of getting Security for the Sum of Mony demanded, he refolved not to lose his Labour of coming into England, and thereupon by his frequenting the Court, got acquainted with the Jewel bearen and e finding out a fit Opportunity, told him that he was by Birtha Flirentine, and by Profession fession a Jeweller, and forafmuch as he heard the King of England was minded to purnot chase the best Jewels he could get, he had to come out of his Country with a parcel of ive fuch Jewels as he believed the like were WS not to be had in England, and thereupon detafired the Gentleman to let dim see those he 21had in Charge, the which he readily did, eft not dreaming of his Defign. When Anon drew had well viewed them, and that they to were of a great Value, he told the Gentleom man, that many of his exceeded them. not only in Lustre, but in Vertue, as being bc Siones of a different Nature, especially one la Locket of black Diamonds which he had ch purchased of a Jew, wholately came from Wn the Indies, upon this the Gentleman told m him, That if he might but fee them, he he doubted not but that the King would at 13least purchase someof them, and thereupof on he defired himto stay and dine with nt . him, the which he did, and after Dinner, 19 -Andrew invited the Gentleman to come the ke next Day to Feronimus Roberti's House to dine with him, and that there he should er. havea fight of them: This he confented W to, and Leave taken, Andrew went to Jefm renimius Roberti and informed him that he ofe had met with aGentleman of a good Estate, nd who for the Love he bore to the Merchant, TT. would become bound for the three thound fand Crowns, and withal told him, that he at 0intend-

n

16 The Willow of Fortmanis. Part I.

intended to be there the next Day, and therefore he advised him to prepare a Dinner to to entertain him, and not to speak any thing to him about his Suretiship till he should give the Signet; to this Jeronimius contented, as well knowing he should have good Interest for his Mony. The next day the Gentleman came, and the Table being spread, they sat down to Dinner, and there discoursed of divers Affairs; when after they were risen from the Table, Andrew took the Gentleman by the Hand, and Icd him up Stairs, pretending to show him his Jewels; and there, taking his Opportunity before the Gentleman was aware with a Dagger, that he had provided for the purpole, he stah'd him, so that he sunk down dead, and then taking his Signet and Keys he got away unespied, and hasted to the Gentleman's House, where meeting with his Wife, he told her that her Husband had received Orders instantly to depart for the Duke of Burgundy's Coutt, and that the -must fend the Jewels, by the same Token there was his Signet and his Keys of his Cabinet, which the Gentlewoman taking of Andrew, went and unlocked the Cabiner, and not finding the Jewels there, returned, and told him, That her Husband must come and look them himfelf; for they were not there. Upon this Andrew deperted much perplexed that he had missed of his Aim, and long time he pondered whether he should return to Feronimus, or fly, during which Space, Feronimus, coming into his Hall, perceived Blood to drop through the Ceiling, and thereupon commanded his Servants to run up, and find out the Cause; where they no sooner came, but they found the Gentleman murthered, at which they were much amazed, and hasted down to related the same to their Master; who took an Hating that any such thing should be done in his House, and knew not what to do in the Business, as being but a Stranger in England, and not well

t I.

and

in-

2-

he 145 ve

ay

ng

re

er

w cd

is

i-

th r-

'n

VS

e

h

d

13 n

is

g τ,

.

ft

F

CHAP. V.

acquainted with the Laws.

How Andrew returned to Jeronimus's bouse, and disposing of the dead Body, and asterward made his Escape; and how the Murther being found out, Jeronimus and all his Servants were imprisoned.

Perplexity about the Murther, in came the Villain that acted it, to whom feronimus said, O thou wicked Wretch! What Mischief hast thou done in murthering an innocent Gentleman in my House? Not so, said Andrew, fr he was a very Cutthroat, and would have stubbed me in hopes of getting some Treasure, which he supposed

I had in a Trunk which I opened; but now the Business is past, it cannot be recalled: be therefore advised by me, shew no sad Countenance, nor Cause of Grief, for I will so dispose of the Body that it shall never be found bereafter; and if any are Inquirers for the Person, you must tell them, That he departed from your House about an Hour after Dinner, and that since that time he returned not. And thereupon Andrew took up the Body and bringing it down Stairs threw it into the privy, with the Head downwards; and then gave Order for the washing away the Blood; after which, understanding, that Feronimus had a Defign to apprehend him, he privily got over a back Wall, and so made his Escape, nor Staying till he came to Tunis, where he become a Rower in a Gally, or Pirate; and a while after renounced the Christian Re-The Gentleman being two Days miffing at Court, many began to wonder. and the third Day accuainted the King thereof, who began to mistrust, that the great Value of his Charge might have made him false, though otherwise a Gentleman of undoubted Reputation and Fidelity; upon which a Messenger was sent to his House to enquire for him, and was informed by his Wife, that she had not seen him in three Days; but that at his Departure he went in the Company of a Florentine, who

pre-

a

F

S

t

r

F

ł

(

l

1 1

f

3

1 h

b

I

(

Part I. The Diffogy of Fortunatus pretended to have great flore of Jewels. at the House of one Jeronimus Roberti a Florentine Merchant, in Lombard ftreet; and that a while after his Departure, the same Person came with her Husband's Keys and Signet, defiring her to fend the Jewels, but the looking for them in his Cabinet found them not there. With this Answer they returned to the King, who was greatly displeased, but that he might not seem over rashly to censure the Fidelity of the Knight, altho he concluded he was fled, he gave order that nothing more should be in it till the end of two Days; in which space Fortunatus returning from on Ship-board (where he had been taking an Account of the Lading) perceived not only his Masterbut all his Fellow-fervants very melancholy; upon which, he demanded of the Maid, what was the Cause of such their fudden Alteration; to whom the answered, (as having before hand premeditated an Excuse) That her Master had received a Letter of the Death of a dear Friend of his, which had occasioned that Sadness in him; and that with him the reft fimpathized, as is the Custom of the Country: but, that he not being his near Relation. he would not go into Mourning for him : with which Fortunatus was well pleased. But now the time being expir'd, and no tidings of the Gentleman; the King in a great nove

fad will r be rers t be re-

airs lead

the unfign

er a

be-

Re-

der,

the nade

up-

by in he who

great Rage, fent his Pursivant to fearch the Merchant's House, who broke open as maby Trunks, Chefts, and Cabiners as they found locked, but found not the Jewels. Upon which, at the Supplication of the Gentlewoman who faid fhe verily believed her Husband was murthered) they went to the House of Jeronimus, where hawing the King's Warrant, they apprehended him and all his Family, upon Sufpicion of Murther; but they also denied it, faying. Indeed there was such a Man there, but that he departed whence in the Company of the Person who brought him thither; and that fince they faw him not. But this Excuse availed not, for they all (being nine in number. of which Fortunatus was one) were delivered to the Sheriffs, who carried them to Newgate, where they were kept afunder, and were frictly examined, but they all declared as before. As for Fortunatus, he was ignorant of the Matter, and therefore could not confess any thing, upon which the Sheriffs were ordered to fearch Jeroni-mas's House, the which they accordingly did, and looked in all the Chests, Trunks, Closets, Cellars, Pantries and Stables, but found not the dead Body, and fo were about to depart, when one amongs the rest having a Torch in his Hand, lighted forme Paper and threw it down into the Privy, where by reason of the Shallowness of the art I. Part I. The Pikozy of Forunatus. 21 h the Ordnre, the Legs of the Party murthered appeared, being cast in with his Head down;

Ordure,

nder, the Light, but he called to the rest, telling them, that he had found the murthered corple, and thereupon they all coming together, drew it out, and after having cleanfed it with Water, they laid it in the lingly he feen of all People, who with great detection, and shaking their Heads, abhorted the Fact: as also a Messenger was sent, to acquaint the Kingly hat they e rest to acquaint the King what they had found forme upon which he gave Order for the racking forme feronimus, and the rest, to force them to confess where the Jewels were, for he supposed that they had murthered him for the lewels:

liverdure. Jewels: when they being stretched uponthe Rack, and in exceeding Torment, confessed the true manner of the Murther, as it is recited. But Fortunatus, although, he was tormented with the rest, could not give any Account of the Murther, by teason of his Absence when the Fact was committed; but as for the Jewels, they all protested they knew not any thing of them.

CHAP. VI.

How Jeronimus Roberti, and seven of his Servants were hang'd for the Murther; and how Fortunatus was saved at the Place of Execution.

TOtwithstanding they made their Confession, how, and upon what Occafion the Murther was committed, it avail'd them nothing, for the King iffu'd out a Commission to try them, where their own Confessions, and the finding of the murthered Corpse in the House being proved against them, they were found guilty, and being condemned, were flortly carried to the Place of Execution; a Pair of Gallows being built for that purpose, where they were urged to confess where the Jewel's were; but they declared they never faw them, nor could they give any Account of them. So that at first Jeronimse was turned off, and then another, so one after Part I. The hillory of Fortunatus. 23 after another, till none were left but the Cook and Fortunatus, who now began to make a thousand wry Faces, as giving themselves over for goue; but when the Cook came to be turned off, he defired to fpeak a Word or two, which was the rea-dier granted, because they supposed he might tell what was become of the Jewels; but Silence being made, he faid Fortunatus was altogether innocent of the Fact, as being abroad about his Bufiness when it was done, and that he knew not of the Body being in the Privy, by reason they all concealed it from him: and therefore if he did die, he died innocently and wrongfully. At the hearing of this, the People prevailed so far with the Sheriff, as to stay d nor reacomprom.

upon-

con-

er, as ough.

f bis her: Place

Con-Ocit affu'd their the proilty, carir of here lewever Acimses

one after

24 The history of Fortunatus. Part I. 1 till the King might be advertised of what had been related, who upon the hearing thereof, and at the earnest Suit of some Ladies (who had caft their Eyes upon Forfunatus, and feeing him a goodly Youth. wore moved to pity him,) the King fent his Mandate to the Sheriff to fave his Life. who thereupon, after he had fastned the rest in Chains to the Gallows, brought back Fortunatus, and in a while after fet him at Liberty. At that time alfo the King commanded Jeronimus's House to be spoiled, t where every one took what best liked him of which the reft of the Florentines hearing. they were fore afraid, and left the Multitude, who were greatly incenfed against them, should break into their Houses, and spoil them; also they laid their Heads together, and at last concluded to raise a confiderable Summ of Money, and fent to the King, to regain his good Affection towards them ; upon which they were received into Favour, and a Proclamation put out in their behalfs, forbidding any to abuse them, but that they should let them freely sraffick as before.

(

CHAP. VII.

How terwards all the Jewels were found the Widow of the murther'd Gentleman, and by her restored to the King.

A Fter the Execution, the King Suppor A fing the the Murtherer to have carried away the lewels, he put forth his Proclamation, offering a thousand Crowns to any that would discover them, or return . them again. Further, he fent to all the noted Dealers in the neighbouring Kingdoms, to ftop any fuch Jewels, if they should be offered to be fold; but after all this, they were found under the Bed of the murthered Gentleman; the manner of their being discovered was thus: About a month after the Murther, the Gentleman being decently buried, several of the Neighbour's came to comfort the disconsolate Widow ; and perceiving her still to be troubled for the Lofs of her Husband, one amongst the rest, who was in the fame Condition with her, but of a merrier Temper, bid her chear up, and by thinking of the Living, put the Dead out of her Remembrance; telling her The best way to do it, was to remove the Bed into another Chamber, fo that the Remembrance of past Pleasures might be forgot, and that by fixing her Thoughts upon fome lufty young Lover, the Remembrance of.

Life, Life, d the back im at comoiled, him; ring.

what

eaning

forne

outh.

Multigainft and s toife a nt to n to-ecei-

n put abufe

reely

P.

26 The Difforp of Fortunatus. Part I. of her dead Husbaad might be done away; adding, That the had done the fame, and found the greatest Consolation therein. But the Gentlewoman replied, O how shall I forget so good a Husband, who tendered me as dear as his Life? had be been bad, I might bave done it. Yet after their Departure, she went to remove her Bed, and had scarce drawn it two foot, but under it she espied a little Casket, the which she took up, and having opened it, she (to her great Joy) found all the Jewels therein; and thereupon fent to a Kinsman of hers, whom she could best trust, to ask his Advice how she should bestow them; and when he came, the first told him the manner of her finding them, and afterwards shew'd them to him; who after some Consideration, advised her to earry them her felf to the King, faying, That if they were offered to be fold, they would be stopped; and then her Life might come in Danger. To this Advice of her Cofin's she gladly consented; fo that away she went, and after Attendance, got to be admitted into the King's presence, where kneeling before him, she faid, Most gracious Liege, I am come humbly to present you with the fewels f r which my dear Husband lest his Life: as I was removing my Bed this Day, I found them under it; and with that the delivered the Casket: Which the King opening, and perceiving they were all there,

Part I. The Difform of Fortunatus. 21 art I. he greatly rejoyced, faying, Forasmuch as way; you have been thus faithful you shall not go un-, and But I forme as might e,fhe carce ied a and Joy) eupfhe v fhe ame. ding im; her ing, they ght her of her Counsel for the future. way be ere aciyou ind remarded: As for the Loss of your Husband. I, as well as you, am not a little grieved, therefore to repair the Loss I will choose you another : and thereupon called a Knight, and commanded him to marry her; the which the Knight confented to, as not being willing to disoblige the King; the Ceremonies of their Marriage was celebrated in the King's presence: And now, faid the Ring, Iendow you with my Mannor of Woodstock, with a thousand Pounds a Year, to continue yours during both your Lives; and thereupon he difmissed them. So that the Bride departed joyful that fuch good Fortune had befallen, and went to all her Goffips to acquaint them with the same, giving the Widow many Thanks for her feafonable Advice, faying: If the haa not removed the Bed, the Fewels might have stood there Time out of Mind; telling her that fhe would always make use

CHAP. VIII.

Hrm Fortunatut having got over Sea, lost himself in a Wood in France: and of his encountring with, and killing a wild Bear that came to devour him.

THe Dread of hanging, and his narrow Escape, so terrified Fortunatus, that B 5

T, he

bis hat:

ng

28. Ept Differy of Fortunatus. Part I did not think himfelf fafe fo long as he trod upon English Ground, whereupon he made what hafte he could to pafs the Seas, fo that having got on board a Ship, in which his dear Mafter used to traffick, the fet fail for France, where they fet him on Shore; and now he being Monyless, thought the best way to get him a Master; but after long enquiring, finding none that would entertain him, he refolv'd to travel forther; when being belated in a large Forreft, where few Pallengers travell'd, he ftruck out of the Road into the Cross-way. which led him ihto further Intanglements, for not being able to find any end of the Wood, when the Evening came, he fat him down and began to lament himfelf, being both hungry and a thirft ; yet there he fat, not daring to fleep for Fear of the wild Beans, which he heard make hideous Noifes from many Parts, and who in the night usually range for Prey; but that night escaping any Encounter with them, the next Day he got up and went onwards : But at last was fo entangled in the thickets, that he could hardly go either backwards or forwards; but at last he found fome Water, of which he drinking freely out of his Hat, he made his Dinner of Berries, and Cornel, and fo paffed that Day. The next Night the Moon began to fhine, and as he was fitting, and greatly bewailing his ConPart I. The hiftory of Fortunatus.

he

10

5, 16

n

1 r

d

-

.

.

s, e n 8

đ

8

Condition, he heard a rustling in the Leave looking up, he perceived a huge Bear coming to him, whose ugly sight did not a little terrise him; whereupon to avoid her Fury, he got up the Tree that stood next him, thinking to continue there till such time as the Bear was passed by; but she having espied him, began to climb the tree after him, and withal made such a hideous Noise, that she caused several other Beast's to repair thither: The Bear came at him with open Mouth, and he still, as she reached at him with her Paws, wounded her in one Place or other, till at length she sell down.

dead, which Fortunatus perceiving, and as well noting that all the other Beafts were withdrawn, he came down and thrust his Sword

The Diffor of Fortunatus. Part I 30 Sword into the Bear's Heart; after which, being al nost starved with Hunger, he flead part of her, and cutting off fome of her Flesh, eat it, by which being strengthened, he the next Morning got up, and refolved to fearch his Way out; when at last coming into the great Road, where he was at first, he met a Walloon, who directed him the nearest Way: infomuch that in an hours travelling he got out of the Forrest, and came to the City of Orleance, where he met with some Refreshment, but had like to have paid dear for his coming thither, as in the next Chapter will appear.

CHAP. IX.

How Fortunatus falling asleep in a Porch in the City of Orleance, had a bloody Knife put into his Sleeve, and how he being found with it, was accused of the Murther of a Gentlewoman, and narrowly escaped; the Person that did the Murther being broken upon thr Wheel for the same.

IN the City of Orleance, in the Kingdom of France, lived one James D' Brat, a rich Merchant, who had a fair and beautiful young Gentlewoman to his Daughter, named Mary D' Bret, who being a confiderable Fortune, had many Suitors, and amongst the rest, a Merchant of the same Place, whose Name was Anthony Monpiles.

Part I The Diffozy of Fortunatus.

it's true, he was a very comely Gentleman. but being young he was drawn away by lude Company to all manner of extravagancies; which made the Father of the Damfel that he would not hearken to the giving him his Daughter, although the Maid could have been well content to have loved him for his Perfon; but being charged by her Father, upon his Bleffings, and the Ties of her Obedience, not to permit his farther Addresses, the not only gave him his Anfwer at his next coming, but also would not from that time forward admit him to fee her, unless by Accident he met her in the Street, and then, as much as in her lay. fhe should shun him ; which made him turn his former Love into Hatred, and to findy of Revenge; infomuch that within a while after, he having certain Notice by some of her Servants (whom he bribed to fend him Word how things went from time to time) to a Knight's eldest Son, who lived at a Village about four Miles from the City: he being moved by the Instigation of the Devil, resolved to hinder the Match whatever it cost him; and thereupon he difclosed his Mind to one Saggue, a bloody Villain, and one with whom he often kept Company, who advised him, That fince the Gentlewoman had proved false to him n breaking her Promise, and now was refolved, by marrying another; to frustrate all his hope; it was but just, that since he could not enjoy her himself, to hinder any other from doing the same; For, says he, it will surely grieve you to think what Pleasure your Rival enjoys, whilst you suffer Pain and Torment; nay more, to think how they will flout and jeer you at their Merry making, and often laugh you to Scorn for being so foolish to bestow upon her such liberal Gists, and all to no Purpose; nay, and that your Rival shall have them at his Dispose.

This so inflamed Montples, that he could afterwards talk of nothing but Revenge. and thereupon fecretly agreed with rhis bloody Varlet for two hundred Crowns to make her away, either by stabbing, poybeing furnished with fit Instruments of Death, Saggue Went to wait about her Lodging, for a fit Opportunity, but finding the came not out, he got on a Servingman's Habir, and having written a Letter in the Name of the Knight's Son, to whom the was fuddenly to be married, he came in the Dark of the Evening and knocked at the Door, which the Maid opening, demanded his Bufiness, who told her, That he came from such a Gentleman with a Lerter, and fome rich Prefents, which he had Order to deliver to none but iher Mafter's Daughter; upon which the Wench went up and acquainted her what the Messenger had

Part 1. The hillopy of Fortunatus.

had faid: So that the innocent Lady not dreaming her end was so nigh, came down, and taking him aside into her withdrawing-room, ordered the Maid to bring a Glass of Wine, the which after she had sat down, she withdrew, as thinking they might have some private Talk which was not sitting for her to hear, when the Maid was gone he told the Gentlewoman a very formal Story, and then gave her the Letter, which the having opened, began to read; whilft he was feeling in his Pockets, as if he had the Prefents there that were specified in the Letter: But instead of Presents he drew out a Knife secretly, and perceiving the Coast clear, whilst she was reading, he with full Force struck it to the Hast in her Breast.

34 Che Difforp of Fortunatus. Part I Breaft, upon which giving a Shriek she fell down dead, which the Murtherer perceiving, he hafted thence, but had scarcely pusfed the outward Gate, when the Father of the Damsel coming by, espied her weltring in her Gore; at which he raised such a doleful Exclamation, aas alarm'd all the house; whereupon Pursuit was immediately made after the Murtherer, who by this time had got Ground, and by that Means he had some time to look about him; when in a Porch heespying Fortunatus alleep, upon which he taking the bloody Knife wherewith he had done the Villany, he put it into Fortunatus his Sleeve, and fo departed. Now by this Time the whole City was alarm'd with the piteous Out-cries of the Servants, who were upon the Pursuit of the Murtherer, who run here and there fearching and enquiring, as not being certain, by Reason of the many Turnings, which way he fled; when at last one of them coming to the Porch where Fortunatus lay still afleep, he cried out, Here he is, here he is: I have found him, I have found him. For indeed Fartunatus had the bad Luck to have a Suit of Cloaths on at that time not unlike to the Murtherer's, by which the Maid that let him in described him to the At the Noise and Outcries they reft. made Fortunatus fuddenly awaked, when Starting up in great Amazement, the Knife dropped

Part I. The Difford of Fortunatus. dropped out of his Sleeve; which they taking up, and perceiving to be still bloody, they concluded absolutely that he had murther'd their Miftress; and therenpon dragging him through the Streets, railing upon him, and threatning him with a thousand Deaths, without giving him the least Knowledge what it was, for when they were come before the Magistrate, they declared what had happened, shewing the Knife they had found about him; the Maid likewise swore it was he; whereupon the People cried out, Hang him, hang him; infomuch, that though he pleaded Innocence. and made many Excuses, he could not be heard, but away he was fent to Prison, and laid in Irons, and in a short time after he was condemned to be broke upon the wheel when it was fo chanced that three Days before the Murtherer was apprehended on Suspicion of another Murther which he had committed; for which being entreamly. wracked, and at the Point of Death, he did not only confess that, but this also, for which Fortunatus was to fuffer, telling the manner and what induced him to do it, and how upon his Flignt, he found Fortunatus, and put :he Knife into his Sleeve as he flept. This Confession coming to the Judge's Ear, he gave Order to flay Execution two Days longer, and in the mean time fent for the Murtherer and Fortunatus, as likewise the Maid

.

.

n

-

.

S

C

.

5,

f

S

78.

to 16

36 y

n

fe

ed

36 The Diffory of Fortunatus. Part I. Maid who had feen him, and fetting them both before her, bid her tell which was the Murtherer: upon which, after some pause the faid, the now well perceived the had been mistaken as to what she had before fworn to in relation to Fortunatus, avowing the other to be the Man; and not only knew him by his Voice, but by a Star in his Pace, and he being no longer able to conceal his Guilt, he told them all the Paffages, how he came to the Gentlewoman with a forged Letter, the which he wrote himself and how he was hired for two hundred Crowns by Montples; upon which the Letter being there, the ludge ordered him to write again, the which he did, and then they being compared, it plainly appeared to be his Hand. Whereupon the Judge thanked God, who had made fuch a Seafonable Discovery of the Truth; and thereupon feat and apprehended Montples, who finding the other had confessed the whole Matter, he also acknowledged it;

the People that a little before had exclaimed against him, pitied him for his wrongs ful suffering, and thereupon made a Parle amongst themselves, and gathered him fix Growns, the which he taking very thankfully, departed the City, giving for which, within a short time after, Montples was beheaded, and Saggue broke upon the Wheel, but Fortunatus set free. And

Praife

Praise to God who had so miraculously wrought his Deliverance.

I.

m

he

d

re

g

ly:

in to find the had the

t-

n

d

-

A

.

11

y

CHAP. X.

How Fortunatus travelling through a Forrest, was met by Dame Fortune, and how she gave him a Purse, that continually supplied his Expences.

Portunatus being got out of the City of Orleance, took his Way towards Paris, when travelling through a huge Forrest, he on his right Hand perceived a beautiful Creature in Female Habit, sitting under a broad spreading Beech-tree, with a Vail over her Eyes, who as he came hear, arose and crossed him in his Way, at which he rejoyced not a little, for he thought there had 38 The Difford of Fortunatus. Part I. had been nonght but Bears and wild Beafts in the Place: But looking steadfassly upon her, he began to ponder whether she might net be a Fairy, or bodily Shape composed by Delufion: But whilft he was in this Doubt, she taking him by the Hand, gently asked him whither he was going; upon which he told her, defiring her that fhe would accompany her out of the Wood. To which the replied, She might not go with him, but that she would do more for him him than any on Earth ever had done : Whereupon Fortunatus gave her many thanks and defired to know her Name, and what the was, and her Bufiness in fo defart a Place; to whom the answered, My Name is Fortunc, and here I am placed by him, who made all things, and therefore has Power to dispose of them as it best pleaseth him: By his Commission I am here placed, to distribute fix things, according to the Influence of the Stars, by his Appointment does direct; the which are thefe, Wisdom, Health, Long Life, Beauty Strength, and Riches; and now is the moment of Choice, therefore make no Delay, for in this Case the Opportunity being overslipped, returns not again in an Age: Be free, and take, for asking any of these which shall seem most pleafing to you. At this unexperted Offer, Fortunatus inwardly rejoyced, and stood not long to paufe, but faid, Then if it be in my Power to choose, give me Riches, even in such abundance, Part I. The Difforp of Fortunatus. abundance, that I never more may be reduced to Poverty. To which Fortune replied, Thy Wish is granted; and thereupon she gave him aPurse, faying, Take this as the Gift of Providence, the Veriue of it being, that in what Country soever you shall hereafter be, when at any time you shall put your Hand into the same, you shall find ten Pieces of Gold of the currant Coin of that Nation where you are ; and so it shall continue to do, during your Life, and the Life of your Sons, but no longer. This more and more rejoyced him, infomuch that he returned her a thousand Thanks: wherefore the rebuked him, faying, That he ought not to thank her for what he had received, but God Almighty, from whose liberal Bounty to the Sons of Men all good things flow. As for me, faid the, I am but the Dealer of good things, and that I do by Chance, for I neither fee nor have regard to the Persons on whom I bestow them, but am always hood-wink'd, as you now behold me, therefore had Wisdom been your Portion, she would have taught you far otherwise, even to have rendered Thanks where they are most justly due. Tet of what thou hast so freely received, bestow part upon the Poor, as thou shalt see Occasion. This faid, Fortunatus bowed low, and promised to perform all she had commanded him: And as for this Day, I will yearly keep it sacred and liberally bestow Alms, nay, I will moreover bestow a large Portion on some unmarried Virgin,

I.

n

1 d

is

y

n

16 0

h

m

:

($

31

a 20

is

T.

.

nt

is or 1r-

10

23

62

Virgin, in order to her being disposed in Mar riage. Then he defired her to lead him out of the Wood, which she promised, and thereupon ordered him to follow her, when as the led him into a great Road, and willed him to go strait forwards, neither turning to the Right or to the Left, nor fo much as to look back to fee what was become of her, when as the no fooner parred from him, but the vanished. Then Fortunatus travelling about three Hours, came to the End of the Wood, where lifting up his Eyes, he beheld a fair House, and being defirous to refresh himfelf there, for he perceived it was an Inn, he put his Hand into his Purse, to try if what had been related were true, and thereupon pulled out ten-Pieces of Gold, at which he greatly relovced, and entring the Inn, called for meat and drink of the best, and by reason the Hoft began to miftruft him, as being mean in Apparel, he pulled out two Crowns and gave him them before-hand, whereupon the Hoft joyfully spread the Table with the best Provision the House would afford.

CHAP, XI.

1

How Fortunatus, at his Departure from the Inn, bought three fair Horses, which Earl Radulphus had before cheapned, for which he was imprisoned, and narrowly escaped with his Life.

THen Fortunatus had sufficiently taken his Repair, and therewith greatly refreshed himself, after three Days Continuance in the Inn, he perceived in the Stable exceeding rich Trapplns, with all manner of Furniture for a Horseman, he demanded of his Host, to what, or whose Horse they did belong, To none, says the Hoft, for they are left here to be fold. Then faid Fortunatus, What is the Price of them ? Fifty Crowns, faid the Hoft. Here is your Mony, faid Fortunatus, and fo taking them he departed. when travelling forwards, fome Distance thence, he espied a great Village with a Caffle in it, standing upon a hill, and thither he repaired with all speed, as having there to light of a good horse, the which in his former Inn he could not do, when he came thither, he asked for the best inn in the Town, and being directed to it, he fat him down, and call'd for Provision, which his Host brought him, then falling into Discourse, he asked him, Whether he knew not of any good horfes

25

th

ft

5

d

to 0

to 1

d

4 b

b

S

17

horses that were to be fold thereabouts: to which the Hoft replied, That there were three exceeding fair horses which had been lately brought to that Town by a Merchant intending to dispose of them at the Entertainment that was to be made by the Duke of Orleance, upon the Account of his Wedding with the fair Isabella, Daughter to the King of Arragon; then was Fortunatus desirous to fee 'em ; but the Host told him that the Earl Rodolphus nad bidden two hundred Ctowns for them, and the Merchant refused to take under three hundred Crowns : No matter for the Price. faid Fortunatus, if I do but like them; and thereupon he defired his Hoft to go with him to the place where they were, which he did, and smiled as he went to think how he should lose his Labour, for he did not imagine Fortunains had Money to purchase them; and coming to the Merchant, after having well viewed them, Fortunatus drew out the Mony, and paid it down, and had the Horses delivered to him, the which he and his Hoft conveyed to the Inn, where he gave Order for rich Saddles to be made. and fuch Furniture as was wanting; defiring the Host likewise to harken out for two trufty Servants, whom he would furnish with all things necessary. But whilst he was making these Preparations, the Earl fent as much Mony as was demanded for the Part I: The Dillogy of Fortunatus 43 the horses; when finding that they were gone, he grew exceeeding angry, and fent again to know who it was that durst buy them out of his Hands; and having understood at what Inn they were, he fent his Servants thither, who coming to the Hoft, demanded if fuch horses were in his Stables. to which he answered, Yes. then faid they, Our Lord has fent to know the Man that durst to buy them out of his Hates. Why truly, faid the Host, he's a Stranger, and came by Accident, when among other things, he asked me, Whether any good horfes pere to be fold thereabouts, and accordingly I told bim, but did not think by his Garb be was able to buy an As: As for Furniture, he brought it with him, but how he came by it I know not. Nay, faid the Servants, in all Likelihood he has robbed and murther'd some Gentleman upon the Road; and thereupon they departed in a great Rage.

t.

ts :

erc

nad

7 a

at

PA

of

h-

-

fic

d-

bn

ee

ce.

be

th

ch

W

ot

ſe

w

d

16

37

€,

1-

h

36 rl

T

16

CHAP. XII.

How the Earl eaused Fortunatus to be apprebended, and cast into Prison, till he gave an Account how he came by his Money; and was obliged to deliver the Horses, and three hundred Crowns, &c.

The Earl having Notice of all that had passed, sent immediately to apprehend Fortunatus in his Inn; who then, by the Counsel of his Host, was preparing to 44 The Diftory of Fortunatus Part 1. depart; but having feized on him, they brought him before their Lord; who, after many reproachful Words, demanded whence he was, and how he came by fo much Money, as to buy fuch high-prized Horses out of his hands. As to the first, he answered, that he was the Son of a poor Courtier of the City of Famogosta, in the Isle of Cyprus. As to the second, he said, What Money he had, he came honeftly by it; and therefore ought not to be questioned about it, unless any could prove to the contrary; adding, That he never yet wronged any Body of one Farthing. But the Earl angerly told him, That it was not likely fuch a Fellow as he should have so much Money unless he had robb'd or murther'd some Person for it; and thereupon' order'd him to be fastned to the Rack, in order to force him to a Confession; yet he resolved rather to suffer the greatest Extremity; than to confess the secret Vertue of his fortunate l'urle; but being put to ex- best ceeding Torture, be defired to be taken. bot off the Rack, and he would confess; the he, which they did, and brought him before that the Earl from out of the Prison; where spar when he had first begg'd Mercy, he said, As Good I yesterday was travelling in a Forrest, it so Earl schauced, that I found a Purse with fix hundred tess and twen y Crowns in it. In what Forrest faid to the the Earls A Forne & about funt Miles from to d this

P

th

W

771 re

De

na

Bi it

35 Pu

of.

the He

is. wil

and

Ex

fad

W

fily

feei

its

Part I. The piktory of Forunatus. 45 this Place. Why, you Varlet, said the Earl, with a stern Countenance, will you rob me of my RioIt ? for know that I am Lord of the Forrest, it, and whatsoever else is found there, appertains to me. I knew not that, faid Fortunatus, and therefore humbly crave your Pardon. But, faid the Earl, you shall be made to know it e're you depart, and therefore now tell me what is become of the Furse and Money? As for the Purfe, repl ed Fortunatus, I took the Mony out of it, and then threw it into a Brook that runs through the Forrest; but if it should please your Honour to take the rest of the Money, here it is. That hall not ferve, faid the Earl, for I will not only take your Money but your Life: and therefore against to morrow prepare for your Execution. I his made Fortunatus exceeding: fad, and began to wish that he had chosen Wisdom instead of Riches, by which he eafily might have escaped such Troubles, but feeing that Power and Tyranny would have: its Will, he fell on his Knces, and with Tears befought the Earl to spare his Life, and take en. both the Horses and the Money; For, said he he, What will it avail you to take away my life, re that am such a miserable Creature? But if you re spare me, I shall ever extol your Clemency and As Goodness. This, and the Intreaty of the fo Earl's Servants, but especially the Count ed tess's Gentlewoman, moved him to relent o that having taken an Oath of him never in. n to discover what had passed, he gave him 1.

CA

af.

led

fo

bs

A.

OF

he id.

by.

n-

he

g-

he 20 fo ron ia

he

e-

of

X-

ús

cut puncy ut Portunatus. Part two Crowns hack, and fent his Servants to fee him out of Town, where they left himy at which Fortunatus did not a little rejoyce, forafmuch as he had his dear Companion, the Purse to bear him Company, then having abjured ever coming within the Earl's Jurisdiction any more, he departed towards Britan, and after fome timed come to Ane viens, a confiderable City of that Dukedom, where, at that time, was held a great Feaft, in honour of the Marriage of the Duke's Daughter with the Prince of Saxony; upon which Occasion a number of Lords and others, were come thither gallantly attended : Upon which, Fortunatus, notwithstanding his late bad Success by dealing in horseflesh, bought three more horses, and put himself in a splendid Equipage, and likewife hired two Servants, and betook himfelf to the best Inn, where he kept Company, and converted with the best, and so continued in great Splendor, till the Celebration of the Marriage.

CHAP. XII.

How an Irish Gentleman was entertained by Fortunatus, as his Companion, and what befel them in their Travels.

W Hilst Fortunatus continued at this City, he spent most part of his time in seeing the Pastimes which were made, as pom:

Part I. The Wiltow of Fottunatus. 47 pompous shows, masques, dancings, tilts, turnaments, and many other noble exercises; and fo being used every day to depart from the Inn with his Men and Horses, the Host began at last to mistrust, he would give him the flip, as some others of his Guest had done, and thereupon he acquainted him with his Thought; at which Fortunatus smiling, put his hand into his Parfe, and pulled out a hundred Crowns, the which he gave to the Hoft, faying, Here honeft Fellow, take this. and when thou thinkest we have had as much as it comes to, ask for more; I shall not be very inquisitive to know the Account. At this the Hoft began to look very pleasant ever after, shewing great Respect to Fortunatur, fetting him at the upper-end of the Table, and handing him the choicest Dishes of Meat, and best Wine; though several noble Persons were there present. Nat long after as was fitting at Dinner with fix Earls, and ten Lords, besides other Gentlemen of good Fashion, several Musicioners came and offered to play before them. telling them, that they had been Gentlemen but were now fallen to Decay, and were forced to take up that Employ for their Living; when they had played a good while, an Earl at the Table asked one of them, that was more likely than the rest, what Country Man he was? Who replied, that he was an Irish Man, and had spent all his Estate

to my ce on,

ha . rl's rds An+

om. aft.

ce's noc

0nd-ndrfe-

put ike-

imom-

d fo ele-

d by t be-

this time e, as mod

48 The Distory of Fortunatus. Part I. Estate in travelling; For, faid he, I have been in most Parts of the World, and can name and have feen, most of the Emperors, Kings, and Sovereign Princes in Europe, Affa; and Africa; and can describe the Splendor of their Courts, the Manners and Customs of their Countries, and speak most Languages, with many o. ther things. Then they asked his Name, who told them he was called Lespoldus, and came of a worshipful Family, which appeared no less in his Carriage and portly Demeanor; upon which the Nobility and Gentry being moved to Compassion, that so goodly a Person should be reduced to Poverty, they liberally distributed Money to him and his Companions, and defired him to flay and attend them whilft the Feast continued ; for which, not only he, but the rest returned their Honours a thousand Thanks. Then one of the Earls asked him if he would be willing to live with him, and become a Tutor, and he fould never want : but he excused it, saying, He had left a Will and Children in his own Conntry, which he longed to fee. Now Fortunatus, who had curiously observed the Man, began to think with himself, could I but procure him for my Companion in Travel, I should think my felf happy; and thereupon, when dinner was ended, he fent privately for him to come to his Chamber; where, when enger'd, Fortunatus faluted him after the moft courteous

P

A

W

Part I. The Diftory of Fortunatus. 49 conretous manner, and told him. That he was minded to spend the residue of his days in Travel: and that if he would become his Companion, he would fo provide forhim that he should ever have Plenty; as likewise provide a horse for himself, and another for a Man who should wait on him. To this Leopoldus replyed, I could be well content with this Proffer, if it were not fo that I fo much long to fee my Wife and Children, which have been the Occasion of my Roturn out of far Countries. To which Fortunatus answered him, If you will make me a solemn Promise, that you will afterwards accompany me, I will go with you into Ireland first, and bear your Charges thither; and then return to Cyprus, the isle wherein I was born, and so from thence, by Sea and Land, travel into other Countries and Kingdoms, as we shall think fit. At this Leopoldus inwardly rejoyced; but having known the exceeding Charge of Travel, he thought with himself that Fortunatus could never be able to perform what he promised; and thereupon told him, Unless you have great Sums of Money, it is in vain to undertake what you propose. Let me alone for that, said Fortunatus, for I shall have Money in all Places where I come. If it be fo, faid Leopoldus, and thou wilt perform thy Promise, I am content And therefore Leopoldus having a horse pro_ vided for him, and another for his Man which Fortunatus had caused to be hired.

C 4

imme.

ave

ame

rgs,

and beir

1471 -

VO-

vho

me

no

or;

ing

7 a ney

his ind

d;

rn-

en

be u-

X-

nd

he ad

nk

for nk

in-im

noft

us

The Difform of Fortunatus. Part I. immediately after the Hoft was discharged, they departed that City; and fo visiting many fair Cities and Towns, at last they arrived at the City of Bruges in Flanders, where, taking shipping, they failed for London, where having staid a while, they departed for Scotland, Still visiting all Places of Note as they passed : and from Scotland they failed over Sea into Ireland, when coming to London derry, and from thence to Waldrink, where was Leopoldus's own house, he was not known, by reason of the Alteration his long Abscence had made, but finding his Wife and Children all in good health, he, by many Tokens, made them to understand who he was, to their no Imall Joy, the next Day came thithea Fortunatus and his Men, who perceiving that Leopoldus was but flenderly provided, gave him a hundred Crowns, bidding him go and buy such Provision as was convenient. and invite the chief of his Neighbours to Dinner; the which he did, and very fplendidly entertained them. When Fortunatus had staid there about a Month, he was desirous to be gone, and acquainted Leopoldus with the same, giving him two thousand Crowns to leave with his Wife and Children, and fo, after Leave taken, and fome Tears shed at parting Leopoldus went with Fortunatus; and as they travelled, he told him of St. Patrick's Purgatory, which was in in their Way, some Miles distant from Wardrink; this made Fortunaius desirous to see it, insomuch, that when they came to Abby, Leopolaus went to the Abbot, and told him, that a strange Lord was arrived there, and was very desirous to see St. Patrick's Purgatory; to which he consensented, provided the Fees were paid to those that kept it. Which Fortunaturus not ed.

ng

ey

ers,

on-

de-ces

and

nen

to ife, 41but od em no orhat ave go nt, to enat us esi-dus

bas

nil-

me ith old

was

in

only did, but likewise presented the Abbot with a Cask of the best Wine that could be got in the Town of Terneck, where the Abby stood: so that in Requital, the Abbot invited him and Leopoldus to Dinner; and at their Request told them that the Town wherein the Abby stood was once a vild Desatt, or Wilderness, and that C 5 52 The Diffory of Fortunatus. Part ! one Patrick, a devout Man, who was wont to leave his Monastery end resort thither to Prayers, when one Day finding a large hole in the Ground, over-grown with Bushes, he enter'd therein, and finding the infide more large and spacious, arched over with pumice, and supported with Pillars of Earth, he ventured yet further, when ftriking into a winding Path, he loft his Way, and could not get out again, but was affaulted with fierce Winds, as hot as the Steam of a Furnace, and heard many doleful Cries and Groans, upon which he fell upon his Knees, and prayed to God to deliver him out of that Place for his Mercies fake; when as he was taken up and carried out the Way he came in; whereupon it was ever fince called St. Patrick's Purgatory, and this Abby he built in Token of his Delive-This made Fortunatus the more defirons to fee it, and resting that Night, he got up early the next Morning, and having shrieved himself, and said his Prayers devoutly; he, together with Leopoldus, who accompanied him, went to the Hole behind the Altar, to which there was a Door, and a pair of Stairs of Earth; when they were in, the Monks shut the Door after them, and prayed for their happy Return, as they used to do for others, that had gone in before him, and withal admonished them not to yenture too far, left they were loft, as

P

VI

ft

an

V

an

th

th

man

Part I The Willord of Fortunatus 5 many Pilgrims had been, who were not found again in three or four Days. natus and Leopoldus being in, went forwards about a hundred Paces, and coming into a narrow passage that they could but go one a-breaft, they turned fo often, that they at last were lost in the Labyrinth, not knowing when they went backwards or when forwards, fo that they continued wandering to and fro for the Space of two Days, hearing loud Shrieks and Groans, and now. and then felt hot Flashes, which so much amazed them, that they wished they had never ventured in; and besides. Hunger, began to affault them very grievously, infomuch that Fortunatus began to fay, That now his purse was useless: and that notwithstanding he had Gold and Silver, yet that would not fatisfie Nature, but that they must now starve with Hunger; and thereupon they both fell upon their Knees, and made a Vow, That if God vyould be pleased to deliver them this once, they would never be fo rashly venturous again. Novy the third Day came, and the Servants vvithout being very impatient of their Master's stay, call'd at the Mouth of the Hole. and held in lighted Torches, but in vain Vyhen as not only they, but the Abbot and and Priefts were in great Perplexity, as thinking Fortunatus and Leopoldus Vvere either loft or dead; infomuch that they began ont

to ole

he

ore

pu-

th,

in-

ind ted

of ies

his

im

. 3

tuc

6-

nd

re-

e-

he

ng

e-

ho

nd

nd

re

m, ey

-3(

ot

as

34 Depillery of Fortunatus. Part 1. gan to fing Mass for their Souls; when as the Abbot calling an old Man to mind, who had measured the Hole with Ropes, he sent for him, and willed him to go in and feek for two Gentlemen that had loft themselves therein; the which, upon their Servants Promife, that their Masters should give him a hundred Crowns, he undertook, faying, if they were allve, he would bring them thence. Whereupon taking with him a lighted Torch, and Pipe, he entred, but that Torch foon went out, yet he passed on playing on his Pipe, sand having gone a thousand paces, began to hollow to them, who with faint Voices answered, till at last, he being directed by the Sound, came to them, and informed them that he was come to fetch them out; and taking them by the Hand, bid them follow him, which they did with no small Content, when they came out, they vvere exceeding feeble, yet greatly rejoyced at their Deliverance: So that when Fortunatus his Men told him hovy they had agreed with the old Man for a hundred Crowns, he gave him two hundred and then ordered a sumptuous Dinner, and invited the Abbot and the reft, and defired them to return God Thanks for the great Deliverance he had fent them, giving two hundred thousand Crowns amongst the Pifefts; and after leave taken, departed; and taking Ship, fer fail for Calice, and from Part 1. The history of Fortunatus.

from thence went to Paris, and over Land to Rome, seeing many fair Countries and strange things in their way.

CHAP. XIV.

S

n

0

1

V

a

d

d

d

at 16

1;

d

m

How Fortunatus travelled from Rome to Constantinople, and what befel him at the Coronation of the Emperor.

Portunatus and Leopoldus having continued at Rome some time, to take notice of the splendor and pomp of the Bishop's Court, departed thence for Venice; whereupon news had, that the Emperor of Constantinople, intended to crown his Son Emperor, by reason he was so old that he could not wield the Government as he ought; the State of Venice resolved to send an Ambassador with several Presents to congratulate this Establishment in the Empire: And now the Gallies being ready, Fortunatus fo order'd the matter with the Captain one of them, that he got leave for him and his Retinue to pass to Constantinople therein; when after ten Days sail they came within fight of the City, and were met by some of the Emperor's Gallies who were fent to welcome them; and coming on shore, the Ambassador and a stately house provided him, but as for Fortunus, Leopoldus, and their Men, they were forced to betake themselves to an Inn, which proved none of The history of Fortunatus. Part L.

of the best; for the Host was a Thief, and usually watched his Opportunity to rob his Guests when they were sleeping, who dreamed of no fuch matter; fo that the Host perceiving Fortunatus to have great store of Mony, he resolved to make bold with fome of it; and therefore, in their Absence, got into their Chamber through a private Door, and searched all about, but found no Mony; fo that he concluded they carried it all about them, and so resolved. when they paid again, to watch where they A while after Fortunatus came to pay, and, putting his Hand under the Table, pulled out Mony and gave it to Leopoldus to pay the Reckoning, that it might not be perceived from whence he had it; so that the Host marked him well, supposed it was hidden in his Cloaths, and was refolved the next Night to put in with him for a Spack: Now Fortunatus, in the missit of his Merriments, remembred the time was come wherein he was to perform his Vow made to Dame Fortune, about bestowing four hundred Crowns on a Virgin in Marriage; and thereupon he called his Hoft, and asked him if he knew any honest Man that had a fair Danghter to bestow, and he would give her a portion: The Host told him, That a Neighbour of his had one was marriageable; upon which, Fortunatus bid the Hoft go to her Parents and

Part I. The history of Fortunatus: 957

and bid them bring her the next Morning; which the Hoft neglected to do, faying. She was gone abroad, and would not return till late the next morrow Evening, the the which he did because they should not part with their Mony till he had put in for a Share; so that when they were in Bed, and fleeping foundly by reason they were tired the Day before at the noble Pastimes that were held in the City, about midnight the Hoft came through the private Door, and first coming to Leopoldus, he felt and foon found his purfe, and took from thence fifty Duckets, then coming to Fortunatus he felt his purse likewise, but not putting his hard into it, he could not perceive any Mony, for fuch was the Secret, that to all those that felt the Out-fide it felt empty, whereupon the Hoft having cut it from off his Girdle, threw it under the Bed, and fo fo fetting open all the Doors and Windows departed; when about the third Watch Leopoldus awaked, and espying all the windows open, called to the Servants, as likewise to Fortunatus, as fearing what had happened, when the Servants were awakened, he chid them extreamly for leaving open the Doors and Windows, but they floutly affirmed, that they fhut them faft when they went to Bed, upon which Leopoldus feeling for his purse, found it gone, and calling to Fortunatus, told him that he was

38 The biffory of Fortunatus. Part I. was robbed, Fortunatus Starting up, bebetween Sleep and awake, found his purfe also gone, and thereupon he fell into such extream Sorrow, that he Iwooned away, which caused no small stir amongst his Servants, so that their Host, who all this while stood listening, came in, and angerly demanded, Why they made fuch ado to trouble the whole house? Whereupon they told him, they were robbed, to which he replyed. Like enough fo, perhaps you have Thieves amongft your falves, and have robbed one another. But when he beheld Fortungtus in that condition, he also affisted to bring him to himself again, telling them, That they ought to dave looked to their Doors and Windows at a time when so many Thieves were abroad. When Fortunatus came to himfelf, he was exceeding forrowful, upon which the Host asked him, How much Mony have you lost? Who replied Not much, but that he had loft a purie with a Bill of Exchange in it worth a thousand Crowns, though it would do them lit.le or no good that had it, for they could not receive any Money, unless he gave his difcharge. Now the Host that knew where the purse was, bid him search about; For said he, it may be thrown some where into the Room; for but few Thieves care for any Men began to look about very diligently, and

Part I The Dillay of Fortanatus 59 and at last, under the Bed, espied the purfe, which they took up, and delivered to their Master, who did not a little rejoyce that he had recovered it; but fearing least by its being cut from his Girdle. it might have lost his Virtue, he secretly put it under the Bed-cloaths, and then shrufting in his Hands, drew out Mony as formerly; then he began to rejoyce, and putting on his Cloaths, caused a Fire to be made, and Wine to be brought; when the Morning was far gone, his Horses being made ready, he rode abroad, and in his Way order'd Leopoldus and his Servants to flay at a Tavern till he went to his Exchequer, and took Monies thence fufficient for his purpose; so that having bought five new purses, he put in one of them a hundred Crowns, the which he gave to Leas poldus to buy Necessaries; and into the rest ten Crowns a piece, the which he gave to his Men every one, bidding them be carefol of Thieves for the future, then went he and took out four hundred Crowns, which he had promised to bestow upon the Maid in Marriage, and so returned to his lang and willed his Hoft to go again to the Parents of the Maid, which he did, and finding her likewise at Home, he told the Father upon what Account he came, How that a Gentleman that lodged at his lnn, defired him to bring his Daughter thither and 60 The biffoly of Fortunatus. Part I. and he would do good for her in order to procure her a happy March. But the old Man thinking it was a Trap to get his Daughter thither to debauch her, would by no means confent, faving, My Daughter's Virginity is all she bath to set her of in Marriage, and if by any means she should lofe that the will not only undo berfelf, but he a Stain to all her Kindred. And fild he I know there are many Rippery Blades abroad, therefore I will not trust my Daughter from home among Athem, but if the Gentleman has any good meaning, and intends to fee my Daughter, let him come to my House, and be shall be welcome, but to let ber come to any Gentleman abroad. I will not. At this the Hoft being much displeased, departed, and told Fortunatus all that had paffed, endeavouring to incense him against the Virgin and to bestow his Mony upon some other. but Fortunatus very approving of the Father's blunt and well-meaning Reply, caufed his Servants to make ready his horse, and to attend him thither, the Hoft going also, when they came to the Door, he Holf knocked hard, and the good Man opening the same he told him. That fince he refused to let his Daughter come to the Gentleman, he was come to her. Which the good Woman hearing, and perceiving his Equipage, the run and caused the Wench to put on her best Cloaths, and prick up her Ears after the

Part I. The hillory of Fortunatus. 61

the best manner she could, and so, with as much trouble as it is to bring a Bear to the Stake, brought her into the Rocm where was, who taking him to he a Prince at leaft, fell down on her Knees before him. but he gently raised her, telling the Father on what Account he came; Therefore, said he, if there be any young Man that is deferving of her hereabouts, ler him come, and I will give him a good Portion with he. At which the Mother told him, Yes, there was a Neighbour's Son who loved her intirely, and would have wedded her long ago, had not his Parents referained him, by reason ber Portion was no ways answer able to his. Then Fortunatus asked the Maid, Do you like this Youth & To which she replied, I will be ruled by ruled by my Parents, and what they shink fit shall be a Law to me. Nay, nay, fays her Mother, and it shall please your Majesty, she likes him well enough, and has upon my faith and troth, a Month's mind to him, but that that the Baggage is Sham'd fac'd. Then Fortunatus ordered the Youth to be fent for, and found that they were of a fir Age to be married, whereupon Fortunatus asked him if he could like to take that Virgin for his Wife, if he should give her a portion? To which he answered With a very good Will, if you give her a-ny thing considerable, for I love well enough but dare not marry her without a Pertion left.

The Difform of Fortunatus. Part I lest my Friends Should disinherit me. then he ask'd the Maid if the was willing. who very modestly replied, Tes, then the Friends being had, he fent for a Priest, who having joyned them in Matrimony, he delivered to the young Man a purse with four hundred Crowns, who, with many Scrapings and Cringings, received the fame. He also gave Money to the Parents of the Maid to buy them Cloaths, and provided the Wedding-Dinner, for which they gave him a thousand Thanks, and praised God that had raised them up such a Friend in the time of need. Then Fortunatus departed to his Inn, and went to Dinner, Leopoldus and the reft not a little wondering how he came by fo much Monv.

CHAP. XV.

How Leopoldus slew the thievish Hest, and how he and Fortunatus made their Escapes afterwards.

the Hoft began to plot how he might come in for some more Money, as well knowing Fortunatus would be gone as soon as the Sports were over; and thereupon he resolved, as formerly he had done, to come in at the privy-door, and rob them, but when he understood they burnt Wax tapers all Night, he was somewhat searful of being

Part I. The biftow of Fortunatus 63

ing discovered: But he had not long cast about for a Project, but he found one, which was this: He getting in when they were all abroad, boar'd Holes in the Tapers, and putting Water therein, stopped them close again; so that when Fortunatus and the relt, after Supper, were gone to Bed, he watched till the light went out, and then entred the Chamber as formerly, and came first to Leopoldus his Bed, where, by his too much tumbling the Cloaths to find out his Money, he awaked him; when as Lee-poldus, whose Sword lay ready, espied him hy the Light of the Moon, he thruck at him with full Force, that giving him a Cut over the Neck, he fe ched a great Groan, and fell down dead; then he called to the Servants.

n

64 The Diftop of Fortunaus. Part I. vants, Asking them why they had put out the Lights? faying, Here are Thieves in the Room therefore fland uyon your Guards. and suffer none to go out. Upon this Fortunatus awoke, and caused the Servants to strike Fire, the which no sooner appeared, but they found their Host weltering in his Blood, and gasping for Life; whereupon they were fore abashed : but especially Fortunatus, who faid, O Leopoldus, W.hat baft thou done? now for this Murther shall we be all banged, bad not we have better have loft our Mony, than Life and Mony both, as now in most likelihood we shall? To which Leopoldus replied, I did not doubt but this was the Thief that robbed us before, and not being Light to differn who I Imote, I knew it not to be my Hoft; nor as it is, faid he a uny other than a Third I have killed; therefore if the Truth were known, we should notes in danger Nay but replied Fertunathis, we may fay what we will, we shall not de belier d'in our own cafe, I've bad experis ence of that once before; and so he told him the flory of the Murther in England, withing fecretly that some rich Merchant of the City knew the Verrue of the Purse, that so he might get him with a great Sum of Mony to pribe the Judge for his Delivery, but then, thought he, if he get fuch an inestimable treasure into his Hands, he will not lightly part with it, but rather incense the 21011 the Judge to dispatch us, that he may enjoy the treasure. Whilst he was in these and such like perplexities, Leopoldus bid him be of good Courage, For, said he, I will foon rid you of your fear. I would you could, said he, and that I was far enough bence. Why then, faid Leopoldus, follow my advice, and in so doing you Shall be Safe before Night come again. Then Fortunatus and the rest of the Servants promised to do whatever he should councel them : Siid he. Whilft it is yet dark, and none are flirring, let the Body be conveyed into the Court-yard and there cast it into the Well, and afterwards wipe up the Blood; then all you Thew merry and pleasart Countenances, and so as soon as it is Lig t, we will pay our reckoning

70

100

The Difforp of Fortunatus. Part 1. ning and depart. This they agreed to, and immediately two of the Servants took up the Body, and carried it to the Well, where they threw it in head foremost, as Leopoldus had directed them, cleanfing the Chamher of the Blood; and when it was morning, got up and ordered their horses to be made ready, being all very chearful; after which they called for Wine, and paying they had the Day before, they gave to every one of the Servants two duckets, telling them, They were very forry they had nor the opportunity of drinking with their Hoft. but notwithstanding they would shortly return, and thank him for his Kindness: So the Servants difmissed them with many Thanks not dreaming of their Master's being murther'd. When they were got out out of the City, they rod towards Turky with all speed, not stopping till they had rid about thirty miles, and then, only baiting for a little, they fet forward again, and were to swift to avoid pursuit, that they rod a hundred miles that Day; the next day they fer forward again, and came to Achipania, a City garrison'd with Turks, and govern'd by a Balhaw; then they were not fullered to pals through without a Palsport from the Governor, which Leopodus fortwenty four Crowns obtained; then had they an experienc'd Guide alotted them, who had, for his Wages, a Crown every Day ;

1

2

de

to

th ro

B

fice

mo

g

e ly

ad it-

nd

ey

ay

bind

not

As-

dus

nad

em,

ay ;

Day; this Guide conducted them to the great Turk's palace, and then, and not till then, could Fortunatus be out of Fear left he (hould be pursued: here they stayed a Month to behold the Splendor and Magnificence of the Palace, which for rich and starely Building, surpassed the Courts of all the Christian Princes, had they been united in one; but seeing that they were for the most part Heathens, and consequently God's Enemies, they would have no Discourse, nor keep Company with any of them: from thence they croffing the Country, pafsed through Bononia, Hungaria, Bohemia, Saxony, Dalmatia, Sweden, Denmark, and many other places viewing the Monuments and stately Buildings as they passed, and at last went into Italy; where passing through the Dukedom of Millan, Florence, Farara, Mantua, and the Kingdom of Naples, they at last came to Venice, which was then 2 place for Merchandise, the richest in the World, there he bought many costly Jewels, Pearls, Gold-fringe, and Gold-imbroideries, with Velvet and other costly Stuff. Now after fixteen years absence, resolving to return into his own Country to vifit his Parents, when he came to Famosta, he heard they were dead, for which he greatly forrowed; and being shew'd the Place of their Burial, he caus'd a very stately and magnificent Monument to be erected to their Memory, with this Inscription:

t

n

ne

di

fe

m an

E

in pl

Do

Under this Marble-pile these Victims lie, Whose Names Death has not Pow'r for to destroy,
But unto After-ages they shall live,
And an Example to true Lovers give:
Fam'd Theodorus, Fortunatus's Father, And beautious Gratiana, his dear Mother, Lie here intom'd their Bodies here do lie, But their great Souls are wrap'd above the Sky.

After this he built him a fair house, and entertained several Maid-servants, bought him a Coach, and other things necessary, so that the Gentry began to wonder how he came by such vast Sums of Mony, when as all of them knew he departed extream poor.

CHAP. XVI.

How Fortunatus, by the King's Command, was married to fair Cassandra, Daughter to the Lord Nemina.

White after his arrival in Cyprus, he purchased the greatest part of his Father's estate, which was sold and morigaged; then built he a fair palace, a Church and Chantry, with Houses for 12 Priests, endowing them with one thousand four hundred crowns a year; made stately parks, gardens, fountains, and sish-ponds, with part I. The illifory of Fortunatus! 69 with many other rare devices; infomuch. that most of the Noble-men of Cyprus were proud of his Company, and many were very desirous to match their Daughters to him, infomuch that the King himfelf taking notice of it, and being in discourse with the Lord Nemina, who had three tair Daughters, he asked him, what he thought if Fortunatus should request one of his marriage? Why truly, reply'd he, and it may please your Majesty, I do not think it fit, for I perceive he has no great estate. and although he has ready Mony, he is fo prodigal both in expences and building, that it cannot last long, and therefore I believe your Majesty would not advise me to match any of my Daughters to him, left as his Father did, he at last should come to poverty; notwithstanding his riches. Indeed, said the King, he has built a fair palace, and many other stately edifices, yet his estate is not at all impaired, for I have been informed, that he has Jewels by him worth a hundred thousand crowns, and yet he will not fell one of them, therefore if you will take my advice, offer him one of your Daughand I will fecond the Matter. By this the Earl perceiving that Fortunatus was highly in the King's favour, he faid, Well, if it please your Majesty, I will commit my Daughters to your dispose, and with whatfoever your Majesty shall do I will be well fatis.

đ

15

n

art

bn

, 2

and ely

ds,

ith

70 . The bistop of Fortunatus. Part I farisfied. To which the King answered, That fince he reposed so much Trust in him he would not only give her in marriage, bur give her a dowry likewife; and thereup. on ordered the Earl to fend his three daugh. ters to the Queen, whereupon he went home and acquainted his Wife with what hall bapned, with which she seemed at first displeased, but after he urged it was the Kings pleasure, she was contented; and thereupon fent her three Daughters well attended and in colily garbs, to the Queen, who received them joyfully. The King having notice that they were come, he fent for Fortunatus, telling him, That he had a design to take him a Wife, and that he, being loath any of base extraction should posfets fo fair and costly a Building, himself would, if he thought fis, provide him One of noble birth, and fuch a One as he doubted not but would please him. Whereupon Fortunatus bowing low, gave his Majefly many thanks, faying, That indeed he intended to feek out for a Wife, but fince his Majesty had far condescended as to give himself the trouble of providing him one, he would not look any further, but wholly Submit to what his Majesty thought fit. Then faid the King, I have in my palace, three fair Virgins, Daughters to the Lord Nemina, of those you shall have your choice; therefore fay, whether you will fee them Sepa-

Part I. The Willow of Fortunatus. 71 separate, or all together. At this Fortunatus paufed not, but replied, If it may pleafe your Majesty. I would see them together. and hear them speak one after another. That you shall, said the King; and thereupon fent one of his Pages to the Queen, to get the Ladies in a readiness, for that he was to rring a Guest in the Presence-chamber, and having notice that they were prepared, he took fortunatus by the hand, who likewife defired that Leopoldus might go with him; which the King consenting to, they went all three together; and where, being come; the King fat down, and caused the Ladies to be brought before him, and placed in order according to their years, the eldest being named, Germania, the next Marcepia, and the youngest Cassandra.

I

ł,

IC

)_

1-

e

S

d

-

r

a lf

t-

)-

2-ne

is

ve

e, ly

it.

e, rd

e;

m

a-

CHAP. XVI.

How Fortunatus, having his choice of the Lord Nemina's three Daughters, chose the Youngest, whose Name was Cassandra, to whom he was married in the presence of the King and Queen of Cyprus.

He Ladies being placed in order, the King demanded of the eldest, Whether she had rather continue at Court, and be one of the Queen's Maids of Honour, or with her Father and Mother? To which, with a modest deportment, she answered, D₃

72 The hillory of Fortunatus. Part I

That, may it please my Sovereign Lord the King, it is not seemly that I should dispose of myself, but rather that I submit to what your Majesty, or my Father shall think most convenient. Then said the King to the next, Tell me Marcepia, which from your heart, you love bost, the Earl your Father, or the Countess your Mother? To which she replied, That is a hard question, and therefore I must humbly beg your Majesty's pardon to excuse me, if I answer not directly to this point, because I love them both so well, I know not how to incline to either hand, and therefore must be filent as to my report in that affair. Then the King said, Casandra, prithee tell me, should your Father and Mother be here, and several young Nobles

Part I. The History of Fortunatus. 73

tI

he

fe

at

ft

rt, le

6.

r.

er

y

i,

Nobles were dancing, and if your Mother should bid you dance, and your Father forbid the same, which would you choose to obey? Indeed my gracious Soveneign, faid the, that question is unanswerable, especially upon fuch (hort Warning, and by one whose tender years are not capable of discerning things as they are, for should I obey one, I would disobey the other, and on either hand prove disobedient. The King having asked them thus far, ordered them to withdraw, and then he asked Fortunatus, which he hest approved of? Truly, my gracious Lord, I like them all fo well, that on a sudden the choice is difficult, therefore if your Majesty will permit me to retire for an hour'sspace, to consult with my Friend about the matter, I will return your Majesty account of my choice. Which the King confented to, and thereupon they retired into the With-drawing-room, where Fortunatus asked Leopoldus what he thought and how he would advise him to make his choice? But Leopoldus declined it, faying, In matters of Love there can be no direct choice made, but by the party who is to enjoy the Lady: For, fays he, what may feem most beautiful to me, may in your Opinion seem otherwise, and therefore pray excuse me in this particular. when Fortunatus urged it, he faid, Well, feeing you will have it fo, do you fit at one end.

74 The Diff/32p of Fortunatus. Part I. end of the Table, and I will fit at the other, and there we will write the name of her, whom we best like; you, as you think fit, and I according to my opinion. This pleased Fortunatus well, and when they had both written, they compared the names, and they were one and the fame; fo that Fortunatus liweetly rejoyced that Leopoldus had approved of his choice: and then went he joyfully to the King, and told him he had Those Cassandra; whereapon the King order'd her to be brought, and fending for his Chaplain instantly, caused them to be married, though to the no little furprize of the Lady, who was not above fourteen years of Age, and the rather, by reason her Parents were absent at the Wedding. After the celebration of the marriage, Fortunatus and his Bride were joyned by the King, Queen and Nobles, but the Sifters of Caffandra wept for madness that their youngest Sifter should be chosen and they neglected; which Fortunatus perceiving, he comforted them in the best manner, and sent for his Casket of Jewels which he had purchased at Venice; and after having presented the fairest to the Queen, he bestowed the rest upon his Bride and herSisters, as likewise the Ladies and Maids of Honour, he also fent Leopoldus with a present of a thousand crowns to the Countess of Nemina, as also to defire the Earl to repair to Court. The

Coun-

Part I. The Diffay of Fortunatus. 75 Countefs, when the understood he had chofen her youngest Daughter, who she intirely loved, was somewhat displeased, but diffembling the matter, she, and the Earl came to court in the most splendid manner they could, and at their arrival, were welcomed by the King and Queen, and all the Nobility, and likewise by Fortunatus, who bestowed richer presents on them than before, which quite diffolved the Countels's displeasure, insomuch that they thanked God and the King that they had provided her Daughter fo brave and rich a Husband, especially when she perceived how highly Fortunatus was in the King's Favour. Then faid the King, I think it convenient, that the Wedding-feast be kept in our Palace. Nay, said Fortunatus, I beseech your Majesty, let it be at my own House in Famogosta. It would content me, faid the King, that it should be there, were it not for the excessive charge it would put you to. No matter for that, said Fortunatus, for there is nothing that can be had in all the Isle of Cyprus, but it shall be there at your Majesty's Service; and if it shall please your Majesty to ordain tilts and turnaments, I shall be exceeding glad, that I may prove my self a Man before your Majesty. To all this the King confented, and ordered his Nobles to be ready within two Days to depart for Famogosta, as likewise the Ladies that waited upon the Queen, and o, 0-

of

S

d

.

d

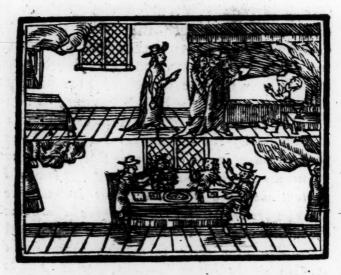

2

r

thers; and for that Day the Bridegroom and Bride dined privately with the King and Queen.

CHAP. XVII.

How Fortunatus and his Bride were accompanied by the King and Queen to Famogosta and what happened there during the Wedding. feast.

Portunatus having the King's Confent to go with him to Famogosta, sent Leopoldus, with two thousand Crowns, to buy provision for the entertainment; who so well managed the matter, that at the Kings arrival all things were in a readiness; there was he met in the great court by all manner of Musicians playing melodidusly,

Part I Cyc Dillus of Fortunatus and entring the hall, presented with gorgious fights; brave dancing and odoriferous fmell, the Cieling being frosted with filver shells, wrought in the curiousest manner, and the fides of Cedar, gilt with Gold, as likewife feveral Lamps of filver, burning spiced Oyl, that cast a fragrant Smell. When the Table was spread, the King, and all the Nobility wondred at the store, faying, That they had not feen the like in Cyprus before; and all that day continued they cxceeding merry. But when night came, Fortunatus was defirous to go to bed with his Bride, for as yet he had not bedded her; whereupon the King, Queen, Lords and Ladies accompanied them to their Chamber, and there used such diversion as is ufual upon the Wedding-night, which made the young Bride blush , but they retiring, left her to the Embraces of Fortunatus. The Fealt lasted fourteen days, and then urgent Business at Court calling the King away, he fent for Fortunatus, as likewise the Earlhis. Father-in-law, and the Countefs, and gave them all thanks for his entertrinment, but the Countess appearing somewhat melancholy, the King asked the cause, whenas the told him, That the feared her son-inlaw would foon waste all he had, so that her Danghter should be reduced to poverty; therefore the should not be content, unless he would settle some Dowry in land up-OB

om

ing

om.

fa

ng.

el-

UY

fo.

he

fs:

all

ly.

nd

The pattern of Fortunatus. Part I: on her. To which Fortunatus replied, That he confessed his Lands were small, but as for ready mony, I will give her eight thousand duckets into my Father, in-law's hands' to dispose of as he shall think fit, for the good of my Wife. Which the King no fooner heard, but he faid unto them, It is very opportunely bit : for, said he, the Earl of Litgorn is about to fell a Lordship, with a Castle and other Appurtenances, being necessitated for ready Mony, and if you think good, I will send for bim: To this they all agreed, and when the Earl was come, the King acquainted him with the matter; upon which, to the great content of all Parties, a bargain was driven, the Earl of Litgorn, in lieu of feven shouland Duckets delivering up his Title to the faid Lordship, with the Government of the Village to Fortunatus; who delivered the Charge of it to his Father-in-law, for the use of Cassandra, which pleased the Conntess beyond Measure.

at

nd

to

er

p-

t-

le

nd

ed

he

8 n

le nt

OT

16

CHAP. XVIII.

How after the Departure of the King, Queen and Nobility, Fortunatus ordained a Feast for all the chief Citizens.

Uring the King's stay, Fortunatus fet up I three Jewels of great Price; the first the Nobility tilted for, he that did best, being to possess the same: the second was provided for the Esquires and Gentlemen: the third for the Citizens, Yeomen and Servants, which caused them to just for nine days, which pastime exceedingly pleased the King and all present. Now the time came, that at the end of fourteen days, the King and Queen, with the rest of the Nobility would depart, Fortunatus with all his Attendants accompanied them ten miles onward of their Way, and then the King defiring him to return, he came back to Bride: and calling his Servants together. gave order, that within two days they should provide another Feast for the Citizens and Gentlemen thereabouts; which was accordingly done, it holding four days with great plenty of Mirth. The Feaftended, Fortunatus taking Leopoldus afide, faid, For asmuch as thou hast faithfully served me bitherto, I will now propose to thee three things, take thy choice of either? First, if thou art minded to return into Ireland, I will give you four four Servants to attend thee, and as much mony as shall maintain thee during Life Second. ly If thou wilt live in the house with me (for I not now mindful of Travel) I will maintain thee to thy hearts content. Thirdly, If it shall otherways like thee, I will give thee a house in this City, and maintain Servants to wait on thee, and thou shalt want nothing during Life. For these kind offers Leopoldus greatly thanked him, saying, I am unworthy of them; as for the first, I being now fpent with age and travel, by reason of the tediousness of the Way, shall hardly get thither: and for the second, seeing you have a fair Lady to accompany you, and many Servants, my being in the house will be needless; therefore if it should please you, I will embrace the latter. With which Fortunatus was content, and bought him a house, provided him Servants, and all necesfaries, allowing him twenty Duckets a Week: Then Leopoldus prayed, that he might be ftill be of his Counsel in all weighry Affairs, and that he would not fuffer his Love towards him to decay, which he folemply fwore to observe. In a while after Leopoldus fent into Ireland for his Wife and Children, acquainting them by Letters of the prosperous condition we was in, and wished them to sell off what they had, and come to him, but before their arrival, he by reason of a grievous Sickness, died, to the great grief of Fortunatus and his Lady, who caused him to be buried in a fair tomb in the Chancel of the Church which he had built; and upon the arrival of Leopoldus his Wife and Children, he entertained them in the best manner, and placing them in the house he had given to Leopoldus, and there maintaining them so long as they lived.

1.

72

u

t

18

V

.

t ı

4

CHAP. XIX.

How fair Cassandra was brought to Bed of two fair Sons, whom Fortunatus caused to be baptized, and named the elder Ampedo, and the younger Andolocia.

Joy, daily solacing with his sair Bride the beautiful Cassandra, he wonted nothing but Children: the dearest Pledges of mutual Love, for which he often prayed, causing the Priests to pray; till at last God heard him, and the tender Bride grew big with her first Son, which was afterwards christned with great Solemnity, and called Ampedo: Scarce had they made an end of rejoycing for this Son, before the teeming Lady perceiv'd herself quick with another Child, which proved a Son also, and was named Andologia, this brought a double Joy, and the rathers because Fortunatus remembred the words of Dame Fortune, which

Were,

82 The Diffory of Fortunatus. Part I. were, 'That if he had no Issue, the Vertue of his Purse should fail with his Life. But Cassandra knew not of this, nor of the Purse, Fortunatus not thinking it convenient to trust a Woman with so weighty a secret. After they came to years of Maturity, he caused them to be brought up in Learning, provided for them the ablest Tutors he could get: as likewise to sence, just, play upon Musick, and all other Arts and Sciences that belonged to a compleat Gentleman: for these were all the Children he was likely to have by the fair Cassandra.

CHAP. XX.

How Fortunatus, sixteen Years after Marage, prevailed with his Wife to Travel again, and what befel him during his being abroad, &c.

When Fortunatus had lived with his wife about fixteen years, he began to think of his former Travels, confidering that for the most part they had been in Europe: whereupon he had been long deprived of seeing such strange Rarities as other Countries in Asia did produce: he thereupon resolved to travel once again, but durst not, for a long time, disclose his Mind to his Wife, for fear of driving her into a sit of Melancholly: but, at last, as he was walking with her in the Garden, he began

Part I The Wiltory of Fortunatus. 83 to discourse her about his former Travels, and at last told her, That feeing it was not likely that he should have any more Children, he was purposed to see the Indies, Ægypt, and Palestina, for that he had already travelled over half the World. This drew Tears from the fair Caffandra, who, with tender Embraces, weeping, with many Intreaties, befought him out of Love to her and her Children, and by all the mutual ties of their conjugal Love, not to leave her, for in his absence her Life altogether comfortless. Then he comforted her, telling her he would make but a short stay of it, reckoning to return within a year, but this nothing pacified the disconsolate Lady. who demanded of him, in what she had offended, that he, who was the Joy of her Life, would leave her? and that if the had transgressed in ought, she would double her obedience for the future. To which he answered, That she never offended him, but that he loved her as dear a his Life, yet he was resolved to go, and nothing but Sickness or Death should hinder him. Then the defired him, if he would needs go, that he should travel into a Christian Country. and not expose his Life to the cruelty of Heathens, who most of all envy Christians, and feek their Blood: to which he replied, That he had feen all the Christian Countries already, and that now he resolved to 1.

ue

ut

he

i-

6-

i-

u-

It.

nd

n-

he

to

g

d

er

e.

A

to fit

as

in

Q

84 The Difforp of Fortunatus, Part I fee both the Indies, and the places he had before-named. But when the perceived the should not prevail with him, neitheer by tears nor intreaty, she fell down in a fwoon. which moved Fortunatus to compaffion, when coming to herfelf, the fighed bitterly, faying. O what have I done, that I must lose the Joy of my Life fo foon? Then the fent to her Father and Mother to come and intreat him to flay, but they prevailed not: So that when the faw there was no way to prevail, and that he had made a Vow to depart. the began a little to be contented, and upon his Promise of a quick Return, unwillingly yielded; when as Fortunatus, leaving her ten thousand Crowns, provided himself a ship, and with his purse, went on Board, only accompanied with two Servants.

CHAP. XXI.

How Fortunatus set sail for Cyprus, and travelled into many strange Countries, and of the Adventures he met withal.

Portunatus having hired skilful Marriners, he commanded to loose their anchor and sail for Alexandria, a City in Agypt, where in short time, having a prosperous Wind, they arrived, when coming into the Port, the Soldan's Officer demanded who was the Master of the Ship? To which
the

Part I. The DIROLD of Forunatus. 85 the Mariners answered, One Fortunatus, a Noble-man of the Iste of Cyprus. Then they said, He must appear before the Soldan, and make his Present; which was the Custom of them that came into that Port. Fortunatus ad he

by

n, yhe to at

at il,
t, paed nt

i-

1-

E-

f-

g

d

h

16

hearing this, took with him feveral rich Jewels, and fo went to the Soldan's Court, being conducted thither by the Guards, that usually wait upon the Sea coast on the like occasion; where when he was arrived, he ordered them to set a fair Table, which being done accordingly, he set many fair Jewels thereon, but had scarce time to place them before the Soldan came attended with his Nobles, and a great Guard, and perceiving the Jewels, he supposed they were set for Sale, and thereupon began to enquire 86 The Distory of Fortunatus. Part I enquire their price; upon which Fortunatus demanded whether the liked them; to which the Soldan replied. Very Well; torasmuch as they were the fairest that he had feen. Then faid Fortunatus, They are at your Highness's Service, take them and dispose of them as you please. When the Soldan heard him fay fo, he marvelled greatly that one Merchant should make a Present richer than any twenty formerly had done, the lewels not being efteemed less worth than five thousand Crowns, yet he accepted them, and promised Fortunatus that they should not be given in vain, and was as good as his Word, for he fent him the next Day three carts laden with Pepper: This did not a little grieve the Merchants, who faid amongst themseives, We have made mamy Presents to the Soldan, but never received any Return; but we perceive this Upft art Merchant is greatly favoured. Within a while after the Soldan fent to invite Fortunatus to Dinner, providing a very costly entertainment, and in a while after the Lord High Admiral invited him likewise, which greatly offended the Merchants, forasmuch as they had given him great Sums of Mony to turn Fortunatus out of favour with the Soldan , but Fortunatus being thereof adverfed, out gave them, and by that, he ever had the Admiral on his fide, fo that he had the first choice of the richest Merchandize,

Part I. Que puttozy of Fortunarus 87 rt I

ma-

to or-had

at

pole

dan hat

her

the

an ted

hey

as

ext

his

ho

red

er-

ile

to in-gh

it-

as

to

d.

r-

er

he

ndize, which he ever bought. But now the time being come for the Ship's departure, he gave the Master of her order to fail to Spain, Hollannd, England, and other places and unlade the Merchandize, which for the most part consisted of Spices; and at the end of one year to return to Alexandria again, where he intended to be; but in the mean while he would travel into many Countries, and if they found him not there then they should conclude him dead, and carry back the Ship and Goods to Cyprus, and there deliver them up to the ufe of his Wife and Children. This they promifed to do, and thereupon they departed, the Mafter to fteer his Courfe, and Fortunatus to Travel.

CHAP, XXII.

How Fortunatus took his leave of the Soldan, and departed for India, and bow he sped there, &c.

The Soldan to many Kings and Princes through whose Countries he intended to travel, he departed with them joyfully, and taking ship he sailed into Persia, where after he had beheld the Splendor of the Emperor's Court, he departed to Cathia, where the Cham of Tartaria bears Rule; there he he likewise staid not long, by reason of the Bar-

Babarity of the People who used Strangers very rudely, from thence he went through many Deserts sull of wild Beasts, which pur him often in peril of his Life; especially a Tyger which lay in ambush behind a tree, waiting for some Traveller, who, as soon as she espied Fortunatus coming, set up such a yelp as made the Forrest tremble, and thereupon came at him with an open mouth stretching out her dreadful paws to grasp him to her, which Fortunatus perceiving, he drew his Sword, and stood upon his Guard, as also did his Men, and as the Tyger made at him, Fortunatuss, with a full blow smore off one of her fore-legs, which yet inraged her the more, so that she came at him again, when he watching his Opportunity

I

h ut

a

e,

D

h

d

h P portunity, thrust his Sword down her Throat, and fo reaching her Heart the fell down dead, then he exceedingly rejoyced, and travell'd on, where by the way he found the remains of dead Mens carcaffes. which had been torn to pieces by the wild Beafts, and caufed his Servants to cover them with earth : This Forrest was exceeding long, and therefore therefore although they travelled Day and Night, it was two Days and two Nights e're they could pass it; then riding through many Cities, they came into India, or the Country of Prefer John, who is a mighty Monarch, and has under him fixty two Kings, being Lord of thirty Islands, besides what he p steffes on Continent, or main Land: Here Fortunajus met with an old Hermit, who was travelling to the Holy Land, and gave him ten crowns to bear his charges; this Hermit conducted him and his Men the nearel way to the Court of the Emperor, and gave them an account of the cuftoms of the Country, faying, That he had passed it many times, and that in his youth he had been a great Traveller. Then Fortunatus requefled him to accompany him in his Travels. but he refused, taying, He was under a Vow to depart ftraightways to the Holy Land: and fo, giving Fortunatus many Thanks for his bountifui Benevolence, he - departed parted on his way, and Fortunatus rode to the Emperor's Palace.

CHAP. XXIII.

How Fortunatus arrived at Proster John's Court, and was splendidly entertained; and how he met there with two Conjurers; and bow they selle two Witches to steal away his Purse; with other strange Adventures.

When Fortunatus from the top of a bill beheld the Palace which glittered with Gold, so that by reason of the Restection of the Sun-beams, it shone like a comet, he greatly admired it, saying, That since it was so sair without, it must needs be very beautiful within; and so by noon he approached it; at which time the Emperor

Part I. Gue Diffus U. Fortunatus. peror and his Lords were returned from hunting of wild Beafts, whereupon he had the Opportunity of feeing them clad in warlike habiliments, which was after fo ftrange a manner, that he greatly wondered; when they were all entred, he came to the Porter, and demanded if he and his Companions might not be admitted to behold the Palace, and take a View of the Emperor's magnificent Entertainments, that fo they might report to his Praise, when they returned into their own Country. The Porter feeing that they were Sentlemen and Strangers, freely admitted them; upon which Fortunatus gave him a ruby worth thirty crowns; then coming into the Emperor's presence, he fignified to him, that he had some Prefents for him, and thereupon drew forth his jewels, which were very rich, for he always bought the fairest, which the Emperor accepting of, gave him many thanks, and ordered his chief Officer to feast them nobly, and to shew them all the Riches of his Palace, which were fuch as Fortunatus had never feen before, for the Walls, some were plated with Silver, wherein were engraven stories of Knights and Battles, with the valiant Atchievements of the former Emperors; others were hung with Panthers Skins, which caft a fragrant smell, the Pillars that supported the hall, they were of Cedar overlaid with Gold.

to

nd

nd

is ill

ed

e-

0.

at ds

on

m-

OF

Gold, and imbossed with precious stones: This pleased Fortunatus so well, that he gave the Officer a Jewel worth a hundred Duckets. Now when Dinner time was come, Fortunatus and his Men were sat down with the chief Officers and Noblemen, for such is the custom of the Country, that none but the Princes of the Blood may dine with the Emperor. Now in the midst of their Mirth Fortunatus perceived the Bottles and Flaggons begin to dance upon the

Table, at which he began to wonder; when one that fat by him whisper'd him in the ear, and told him that was done by Magick, and that the Emperor kept two Necromancers to make passime for Strangers; now after the Bottles had done dancing, there sprung

Part I. The pilitopy of Fortunatus. 93 es :

he

red

vas

fat

ry,

ay

dit

ot-

the hen

the

ick,

120-

WO

rere

ung

sprung up a Tree full of fair Oranges which feveral Blacks came and plucked offand then the Tree vanished, after that a large Stag came running in, and after him's pack of Hounds at full Cry, who taking a Course or two round the Hall, vanished, then several fair Women, in ftrange Attire came in playing upon Lutes, and after having danced a turn or two, vanished. At this Fortunatus was greatly amazed; but well confidering with himfelf it was only a Delusion of the Devil's, and no real Substance, he rested the better content. Now when Dinner was ended, the Emperor fent for Fortunatus to ride a hunting with him, which he gladly did, and coming into a Forreft about fix miles from the Palace, there they rouzed a Lyon who was fleeping in the thicket, who shaked his brindle Mane. and roared fo loud, that all the Forrest trembled; upon which the Dogs were uncoupled, of which he tore feveral in pieces, and fought against feveral of them for the space of an hour, when the Indians came running in with their Lances, and run him into the Body, so that he fell down dead; then took they off his 5kin as a Trophey of Victory: After that, the Dogs found out a great wild Boar, upon which they fastned, notwithstanding he gored many of them with his horrid tusks, which were at least a Foot long, and then the Ja-1 ... E 2 vellings 94 The Ditory of Fortunatus. Part I. vellings being darted thick at him, he at laft was killed, and his Head being cut off. was carried before the Emperor, with a Spear, as likewise the Lyon's Skin. By this time Sun was fet, which made the Emperor haften to his Palace, where at Suppertime. Fortunatus drew a great deal of Gold out of his Purfe, and gave amongst such as attended at the Table, which the Necromancers perceiving, who were also fitting at the Table, they thought with themselves this Stranger must needs be exceeding rich. that can thus liberally dispence with his Money, therefore it will not be amis, when he is in Bed, if we use our Art to get some of him: So that when all was done, and every one gone to their Chambers, they began to mutter over their Charms, and by that means raised their Familiars, commanding them to tell them who the Stranger was, and how he came by fuch quantities of Gold and Jewels, to which they replied. He was a Merchant of Ciprus, and had a secret Mine, which they were forbid to reveal, which could not be emptied during his Life, and thereupon they vanish'd. Now the Conjurers fent for their Wives, who had familiar Spirits likewise to attend on them, and could transform themselves, to Appearance, into any Shape, they being come, the Conjurers commanded them, in the Shapes of Monkies, to enter Fortuna-

The Distory of Fortunatus. Part I. tus his Lodgings, and bring thence what Treasure they could find, the which they readily obeyed: When opening the cafements, they entred, but by clapping them too and again, Fortunatus awoke, and fuppoling that they had been Thieves, drew his Sword, and striking at a venture, cut one of their four Feet off, whereupon they got out at the Window again, making fuch a lamentable Noise, as awaken'd a great many of those that lodged near; next Morning Fortunatus getting up, espyed a Hand lying on the Ground, at which he was fore dilmay'd, but as he went to take it up, it was fnatch'd from him he knew not how, so that he never saw it after : Yes so it happened, that the next Day one of the Conjurer's Wives had loft her Hand. which occasion'd her Husband to fall out with his Fellow for putting her upon that Exploit; infomuch, that falling to Words, they both vowed Revenge one of the other; when as he that had his Wife hurt, taking his Opportunity when the other was leaning out at the Window, he fixed a great Pair of Stag's horns upon his Head, fo that he could by no means draw it in, but was obliged to flay there till the charm was disfolved, which caused a great laughter to such as beheld it, but in him it caufed a desperate Resolve of Revenge; so that one Day he having drawn the Figure E 3

is

erld

as

0-

g cs

1.

is

n

30

d

Y

d

n-

1-

1-

d id

11-

d.

S,

b c-

n.

1-

45

96 The Difford of Fortunatus. Port I. of a Man upon the Wall, with Small-coal, he compell'd his Adversary, notwithstanding all the Intreague he used, to stand up against it, to go to it, when immediately the Wall opened, and he finking into it, was never heard of afterward. These Projedts and hellish Arts fo affrighted Fortunatus, that he having got together abundance of Merchandize, and the Emperor's Letter of free Traffick in such Countries as he came into, under his Jurisdiction, he took his Leave and departed, travelling towards Gerusalem ; where he no fooner arrived but he found an old Hermet, who frewed him the holy Sepulchre, the pieces of the Crofs, the Apostle St. Fames's Tomb, and many other Relicts, which Pilgrims go thither to fee; when he had viewed as much as he shought fit, he began to remember the Promise he had made to his Wife; and thereupon taking Leave of the old Man, he journied to Alexandria.

CHAP. XXI.

How Fortunatus was welcomed by the Soldan at his return to Alexandria, and what befel him during his stay.

Portunatus being now within e,ght miles of Alexandria, he sent one of his Servants, to acquaint the Admiral of his Approach, and to defire the Soldan's Letters

Part I. The Biffor of Fortunatus. to enter the City with his Camels; of which he had about twenty loaden with the Riches of India, having hired Natives of the Country to drive them, and to have the stronger Guard for fear of Robbers: When the Servants had done this Messuage. the Admiral ordered his Horses to be made ready, and rode to meet Fortunatus who lovingly embraced him, and asked him how he had far'd during his travelling in strange Countries, whereupon Fortunaeus told him what had happened from time to time: Then he conducted him to the Soldan, who was glad of his Return, and caused a Feast to be made for him, when within three Days after his coming thither. his Ship arrived from Famogofta, with Letters from Cassandra, who earnestly defired his Return; fo that having put on board his Merchandize, he would have fet fail; but going to take Leave of the Soldan, and to make him a Present, he would needs have him ftay and dine with him, which he could not deny him; yet he fent one of his Servants to the Master of the Ship, to require him to be in a readiness to set fail ; for that he intended, as foon as he had dined, to come on board: The Master was obedient, and put off the Vessel ready to fail, all her Anchors being weighed; yet the time of Fortunatus's coming was prolonged, by reason that the Soldan held him E 4 in

1-

up

6-

CE

er

31 k

Is

11 n

s,

d

In Discourse about his late Travels; the which Fortunatus was obliged to relate, thanking the Soldan for his Letters, by which means he told him he had found kind Reception in many Places, especially from the neighbouring Princes, who spake very well of him. Then would Fortunatus have taken his Leave, but the Soldan prevailed with him to fray Supper also.

CHAP. XXV.

How Fortunatus, going with the Soldan into his Treasury to see his Jewels, understood the secret Vertue of his Wishing-hat; and how wishing himself on Ship-board, he was brought thither through the Air, and set sail for Cyprus, with the Wishing-hat.

he should break his Promise with his wife, after Supper was ended, drew out a great deal of Gold, and bestowed it freely upon the Servants, and again demanded leave to depart: But the Soldan seeing his infinite Riches, thought, that unless he shewed him his, he might boast in his own Country that he had the greater Wealth; whereupon he desired him to soldow him, and so led him into his Treasury, which was all hung with cloath of Tinsey; and the Tables spread with Jewels, Rings, and Vessels of Gold and Silver, Gold chains and

Part I The Difforn of Fortunatus. 975 and huge Pearls; with many other things of great price, which Fortunatus had never feen the like before: Then he had him into another Room, where he shewed him an infinite Mass of Mony; And now, says he, I have one thing more, that I esteem above all that you have yet beheld: This made Fortunatus wonder, for thought he, it must be of an inestimable Price, if it exceeded what I have feen already, and thereupon he grew impatient to have a View of it: When as the Soldan taking him by the Hand, led him into another Chamber; and there taking down an old Hat, faid, This is the Jewel; at which Fortunatus smiled, telling him, That was an old Hat, and might be bought for a small matter : Yes, faid the Soldan, If it was only a Hat, it was of no Value: but there is such a Secret retained in it that for all the Hats in the World, I would not lose it : Nay, should I lese all my Jewels, I could surchase more. but should I lose this Hat, t it Such another the World affords not. Then was Fortunatus desirous to know the Secret n: it retained; then faid the Soldan, Since you 1 are my Friend, I will impart it to you; which B. 0

he

ch

..

he ell

en

th

to od

d

45 iil

Œ

is

is this, that having this Hat on, where ever you milb your self to be, thither you shall be conveyed almost as swift as can be thought: So that when my Nobles are gone a hunting, it is but wishing my self with them, and I am there; when my

Arms are abroad, I can be with them, and in ES

7714

my Palace, almost in a Moment: as likewise upon any Occasion, 'tis but putting this Hat on and I can be carried into any Country with a Wish, and so back again. At this strange Report, Fortunatus stood amazed, but yet secretly pondered with himself, that is it were true the Soldan said, he would by any means possess, if he might, for thought he, my Purse and that Hat are enough for the richest Emperor in the World: And thereupon he asked the Soldan, by reason of the qualities it retained, whether it were not heavier than any other Hat; No, said the Soldan, but rather lighter than any other, therefore for your Satisfaction, try it on your head. This was what Fortunatus wish'd for, which made him that he could scarce for bear Part I. The Willow of Fortunatus, Total bear smiling; faying. I thought it had been much heavier; and withal, that he did not think that the Soldan knowing the Vertue on't, would be fo unadvifed as to truft him with it: and thereupon stepping to the Window, he wished himself on board his Ship; and thereupon, before the Soldan could ftop him, he flew out at the Window and was in his Ship in a Moment, then commanding the Marriners to clap up all their Sails, they steered their Course before. tue Wind with fuch speed, that although the Soldan cummanded his Gally, that lay in the Port to make after them, they could not come near Fortunaius, upon which the Soldan was yet the more inraged, fwearing by his Gods, that if he could take him he would put him to the cruellest Death that ever Man died ; but the Merchants that usually traded there greatly rejoyced when shey heard what was done, though they durft not flew it openly : For, faid they, now this Interloper will come no more among & us to Spoil our Traffick. The Soldan being greatly perplexed in his Mind for the Lof of his Hat, was resolved to send after Fortunatus into Cyprus, there to make him large Offers, if he would either fend or bring it; whereupon he fent for Marcholandus, a Venetian, that served under him. and acquainted him with what had passed, and willed him to take one of his best Ships and

ife

at ith

ge

ct

it

aht

or

nd

n

18

and follow Fortunatus into Cyyrus; and first persuade him by Intreaty and Promises to restore the Hat, and if that would not do, to complain of his Treachery to the King of the Island, and if he resused to do Justice, to denounce a War against him; this the Vevetian gladly undertook as well knowing, if he could recover the Hat, the Soldan would greatly savour and reward him; and so having all things in a Readiness, he set sails

G H A P. XXVI.

How the Soldan's Ambassador came after Fortunatus to Cyprus, for the Wishing hat; and how-be complained to the King, but was sent away without it.

from Alexandria, arrived at Cyprus, where he was joyfully met by a great number of the Nobility, and conducted to the King's Presence, who welcom'd him home, and asked him of his Travels, the which he ar large related, and then taking his leave, put on his Wishing hat, and going without the City, wished himself at his own House, and was there in a trice, when coming in, he met Cassandra, who run to him, and classing him in her Arms, could not speak to him a good while for Joy; then he having saluted his Sons and Servants,

Part I. The wistom of Fortunarus. 103 he commanded Meat to be fet before him : and the next Day invited a great Number of his Neighbours to dine with him, whom he feasted after the best manner. Now when he had been but 8 days at home, on the tenth of his Arrival in the Ifland, Marcholandus, who was fent by the Soldan, came to his House, and defired to speak with him! who coming to him, he defired that they might be in private : Whereupon Fortunatus took him by the Hand, and led him into the Dining room, and then willed him to declare his Bufiness; whereupon he delivered him the Soldan's Letter, and therewithal informed him how ungrateful he had been, in taking away the Hat, yet the Soldan would forget it all, and highly reward him, if he would restore it : I must confess, said' Fortunatus, the Soldan has cause to be offended: But let him thank his own Folly in putting it upon my Head, I knew not the Vertne of it before be declared it; and therefore since I ran the Hazard of drowning, by flying on Ship board with it, I am in the mind never to part with it. Then Marcholandas told him what Offers the Soldan had made him, if he would restore it : and therefore out of all Love, defired him to let him carry it with him, or that he would carry it himself : But Fortunatus told him he would not part with it for the Soldan's Kingdom, and therefore willed him to cease his Suit, Upon

l'

0

i

8

d

34

1-36

6,

h

is

g

is

n.

O

d

n

Si

36

104 The Difforp of Fortunatus. Part I Upon this, Marcholandus growing impatient, began to threaten him, faying, That he would complain to the King, and if no Redress could be had there, the Soldan will right himself by Arms: At which Fortunatus fmiling, bid him do as he pleased, and thereupon Marcholandus departed to the Court, where, procuring to be admitted to the King's Presence, he grievously complain'd of . Fortunatus, telling all that had happened concerning the Hat, and defired his Majesty to use his Prerogative Royal in compelling him to restore it; but, the King faid, Fortunatus is my dear Friend, and I will not in any wife use Compulsion towards him. but if he will deliver it up of his own accord, well and good, but if not, the Law is open, and you mnst take your regular Course. But Marcholandus well knew that Fortunatus was too powerful in his own Country, for a Stranger to wage Law against him, whereupon he told the King, That upon the Refusal of delivering the Hat, he had a Commission to denounce War : Even as you please for that, faid the King; and tell the Soldan, That although I efteem his Friendship. yet I fear not his Anger, but shall defend my felf as well as I can. Upon this Marcholandus returned very heavy, and told the Soldan all that had paffed. who thereupon conceived fuch aninward Grief for the Loss of his Hat, that in a short time he died. CHÁP

I

t

I

d

C

d ls

72

18

.

15

r

-

3

a

14 58

P.

ny

7-

1-

1-

of

CHAP. XXVII.

How Fortunatus, finding himself in a deeliing Condition, prepared himself for another World, &c.

Tortunatus being now about fixty years of Age, began to bethink himself that his thread of Life was almost at an end, and thereupon he resolved to prepare himself for a future flate; greatly lamenting the loss of so much precious time as he had spent in frivolous and vain Trifles, wishing that he had chosen Wisdom rather than Riches: For, faid he, they are cumbersome and full of Danger. How often have they de-Broyer out Sout and Body? And what Wickedness is there in the World that will not be done for Mony? What horrid Blood fied Maffacres, and Civil Wars does it fir up? Well, I must confess, for the greatest part of my Life Thave had exceeding Plenty, but have not lived So free and trulymerry, as when I had nothing but what I worked for : How often has my Life been endangered by reason of my Purse? Nay, past doubt, I had been murthered long since for it, bad any known its Vertue; but now I will earnestly repent me of my former Folly; and upon that he let fall many Tears : At which Instant, Cassandra coming in, demanded the Cause of his Heaviness, to whom he imparted it without Dissimulation; and she

OIL

on the other hand strove to comfort him: but at last his Melancholly drew him into a Consumption, which soon occasioned his Death, as shall in the next Chapter be shown.

CHAP. XXVII.

How Fortunatus falling sick, made his Will, and declared to his Sons the Vertue of his Purse and the Hat, with a Command not to disclose them to any, as likewise of his Death.

Portunatus being sick unto Death, and perceiving his End to be nigh, called his Sons to him, and blessed them, bidding them to live lovingly and peaceably together: and that he would leave them a sufficient

Part I. The Difform of Forunatus. 107 ficient Competence to maintain them both in a most splendid Condition : But, Said he, it is such a Secret, as will lose its Vertue, if once discovered; therefore take my Councel in all Points, and fo you prosper, or otherwise you'll be in perpetual Danger ; for fetdomis it feen, that disobedient Children profper. When he had faid thus much, he called for his Purse aud Hat,, and he advertised them of: the Secrets they contained faying, No More tal ever yet knew the Vertue of the Purfe, my felf excepted. But as for the har, faid he, I got it from the Soldan of Babylon, who offered me many rich Prefents for to have it again, he esteeming it more worth than his inestimable Treasure; therefore as you tender the enjoying of them, do not any wife disclose the fecres Vertue of either of them, lest in fo doing. you either lofe them, or your Lives. And farther, he advised them not to part the Jewels, but to live together lovingly: and when he had so faid, he cryed with a loud Voice, Lord, receive my Spirit, and fo yielded up the Ghoft: after which, his Sons and his Wife made great Lamentation, for him, and caused him to be buried in the Chancel, near his Father and Mother in a new tomb, which he had caused to be built in his Life-time. About a Month after, Cassandra, for the exceeding Sorrrow she conceived at his Death, fell into a violent Feaver, and died likewise; and was by her

rt I

inned

ill,

his

Walls to id ed

eif-

Part I. The Hiffory of Fortunatus 108 her Sons buried in the same Sepulchre with her Husband, and the Sons caufed the following Epitaph to be fet on their Tomb.

TEre Fortunatus lies wish bis kind Wife. Who from a poor State, reach'd aglutious Life ! Fortune befriended bim, a Purse fbe gave, That Monoy be when e're be would might have; A Wishing-hat be bad, that would transport Him where be wish'd so be in wondrous fors. These were the Comforts of bis Days, till Death Laid bim thus low, by ceafing of bis Breath : Yet to uphold his Memory, you'll find He left two Sons as famcus fill behind; To whom be did bequeash his Purfe and Hat, Which in the end brought on them a fad Fate, And from this World their better Part made fly To find their Father in the starry Sky.

The End of the First Part. Well hrefed

fe :

THE

HISTORY

The Bellop of Fortunatus, Patt II

equares his Father had met wish

OF

FORTUNATUS's

Two Sons,

Ampedo and Andologia.

The Second Part.

CHAP. I.

How Andolocia went with the Purse into the French Court, and what Entertainment be found there.

were over, Andologia, Forematus his youngest Son, being inflamed with a Desire to Travel, upon reading what what Adventures his Father had met with in several strange Countries, he thus bespake his Brother, Dear Brother, since we are both in our Youth and Strength, it's not sit that we should spend our Time in idleness; therefore let us travel and see strange Countries. But this nothing liked Ampedo, the eldest, who was given rather to the rest of a quiet Life; whereu pon he answered, Dear Brother, if you are minded to travel you may, but as for me, I'll stay in this Falace, and spend my Days in my own Country. Then said Andolocia, Let us part the Jewels, give me my Portion, and let me be gone. Not so, said Ampedo, know you not that it was our Father's strict Command when he died, that we should not part with them. No matter for that, said Ando-

7

l

I

Andolocia, now he is dead, he will never repine at what we do. Then said Ampedo, Take your hat, and he packing. No, said andolocia, I will have the Purse, if any. Upon this there arose a hot Dispute between them; till Andolocia said, If you needs will have Mony, fill two Coffers out of the Purse, and take the hat and the rest of the jewels, with free Possission of all the houses and palaces, and give me the Purse only, and at six years end I will return, and deliver it you again. To this Ampedo consented, lest in the heat of the quarrel, the secrets of the purse should be revealed; and so the difference between them was ended.

Andologia, having got the purfe, departed joyfully; and after having passed thro many Countries, at last he came into France, when, repairing to Paris, the chief City, he went to view the Splendor of the King's Court; where attiring himself with the Nobility and Gentry, spending even to Admiration; for such was his Liberality. that he exceeded most of the Nobility and kept fuch ftately Entertainment, and fuch costly Garbs as the Country did afford : but long he had not staid there, before Justs was ordained, and a Challange made by certain Noble Personages against any that durft encounter them: Upon which Andologia prepared for the Combat, and unhorfed three Earls one after another ; of which

t II with wake

t we e let But
est,

robut

end An-me aid

er's

-

1

dd

which the King took great Notice, and ordered that he should be entertained in his Palace: When Night came, the Ladies and Gentlemen were disposed to dance; amongst which, the King would have Andolocia make one, where he fo well behaved himself, that all the Eyes of the Ladies were upon him; and frm that time forth, they highly esteemed him; and he by often converting with them, at last fell deep in Love with one of them, who was a beautiful Lady, and Wife to a Courtier of Andolocia's acquaintance; and so passionate he was, that finding a fit Opportunity, he told her his Defire, faying, If you will confent to lie with me one Night, I will you a thousand Crowns, But the being a vertuous Lady refused tiol I'v 112 The Dillop of Fortunatus, Part If fused his Proffer, and acquainted her Husband what Andologia had offer'd; who considering what a great Help a thousand Crowns would be to him in his Necessity, yet was very loath to be a Cuckold; fo that casting about, they at last agreed to a Neighbour of theirs to supply her room, and fo to deceive him in his Expectation; this liked them both every well; whereupon when Andologia importun'd her again, fe gave him Hopes, telling him that fuch an Evening her Husband would be abroad abroad about earnest Bufiness : and then if he would come and bring with him the Mony, he should be entertained to his Wish. This rejoyced not Andolocia not a little, who thought every Day a Year till the harpy Hour was come. Now in the mean time, the went to her Neighbour and told her, she should have a hundred Crowns if she would but prostitute her Body to a Gentleman in her flead, fo that it might not be discerned; For, said the, I would willingly do it, but that my Husband fonarrowly warches me that I have no Opporeunity. To this her Neighbour freely confented, without any Scruple of Conscience, as being used to the Trade; and fo at the Time appointed Andolocia came and brought the Mony, which the Lady took; then bidding him fit down, the conveyed her Neighbour in at the back door, and put her into her own or-

SENSON.

La-nce;

thadies rth, Iten p in ndoe he nt to

re.

114 The Diffogy of Fortunatus Part I. Bed: and when it was dark, Andologia was, by the Chamber-maid, whom he bribed with twenty Crowns, led to the Bed, and there pulling off his Cloaths, in he went, and embraced the Gentlewoman with abundance of kindness, sporting it by times till it was almost Day; when as his Bed-fellow would have risen, but he would not fuffer her : fo that the knowing when light appeared, the should be discovered, for fear freely confessed the whole matter; But which greatly grieved him that he had been fo deceived, for instead of a beautiful Gen. tlewoman whom he thought he had in Bed with him, he had embraced a common Strumpet; yet dissembling the Matter as well as he could, gave the Baggage a hundred Crowns, telling her what he had given the Gentlewoman before; and ordered her, as foon at he was departed the City, to fue for them, feeing the Gentlewo. man had not performed her Promise; which fie, being armed with Impudence, did accordingly, and put the Lady to great Shame and Difgrace.

whole set a friend has an our awe red own redesign beaution for away if mid 3 lobid asdr / sec. 1. 2 CHAR t I.

bri-Bed.

he

vith

mes

not ght

for

But

een

Gen-

Bed

non

r as un-

gi-

der-

Ci-

wo.

ife ;

ace,

reat

CHAP. II.

How Andolocia went to the King of Spain's Court, and of the noble Entertainment he received there, and what Atchievements he made.

Ndologia having had this Female-cheat put upon him, resolved to stay no longer in the French Court, lest it should be noised abroad to his Disgrace; but immediately taking Horse, he rode with his Servants to Navar, from thence to Arragon, and so to the Spanish Court, which in those Days greatly flourished; where, for the better entertainment, put he himself in a Spanish Garb, for such is the Humour of that Nation, that they will, by their good Wills, fort themselves with none but such as comply with their Fashion. At that time there were Wars with Portugal, fo that Andologia raising a hundred Men, payed them himself, and rid at the Head of them in the King's Service; where by his Valour and undaunted Courage, he got himself great Praise, insomuch that the King taking notice of it, not only knighted him, but likewise bestowed many rich Prefents on him, and proffered to marry him to the Daughter of an Earl; with whom, after her Father's Decease, he should have the the Earldom: But Adolocia humbly thanked his Majesty, saying, that he was not disposed to marry, for that he was resolved to fee many Countries, Within a while after the Wars ceafing, Andolocia dismissed his Soldiers, and took leave of the King, who was very loah to part with him; vet, Andologia urging him, he bid him fare. wel, and whenever he came into Spain aagain, to make use of his Court, as freely as if it were his own. After he had left the King, he took shipping and sailed for England, when coming up the River of Thames. he landed at the Tower of London, and much admired the ftrong and stately building; when coming to the Court, and having taken a View of the same, he searched for Part II. The Diff 320 of Fortunatus. 117 for a stately House as near to it as possible; which he having found, furnished it after the best manner, and retained many Men and Maid fervants, keeping a very plentiful Table, infomuch that a great many of the Courtiers reforted daily thither, and were by him featted; of which the King bearing, he fent for him, and asked him what he was; who accordingly told him; then faid the King, Will you be content to have a Command under me in the Wars against the Scots ? Tes, with a very good Will, Said Andologia; and will raife and maintain a hundred Men at my proper Cost and Charges. At this the Bing was greatly pleased, and made him a Captain, fo that going against the Enemy, he fought so manfully that he broke their Ranks, and greatly disordered them, infomuch that fresh Forces coming on they foon put them to the Rout, and although many did bravely that Day, yet Andolocia did beft, which ftill the more indear'd the King to him.

1.

k-

ot

d

d

y

CHAP.

118 The Willop of Fortunatus. Part II.

CHAP. III.

How Andolocia being at Dinner with the King, fell in Love with Agrippina the Princess, and what happened after.

Andolocia was no sooner returned from the Wars, but the King sent his Steward to invite him to Dinner; as likewise several of the chief Commanders were present, many Ladies and Gentlewomen, and amongst the rest, the Princess Agrippina, who, for Beauty, surpassed all her Sex: on her Andolocia fixing his Eyes, so surfeited on her beauty, that he could neither eat nor drink to any purpose, but still kept his eyes fixt on her; and wished that he was a Prince

Part II. The Diftory of Fortunatus. 119 Prince for her 'fake, Though, faid he, I am as well able to keep her, as ever a Prince in Christendom; yet, I not being of Royal Blood, it will be but in vain for me to flatter my felf into a Belief, that she will condescend to my Request, should I ask her; yet, 'tis but trying. And from that time forth Andologia attired him in Purple and Gold, and would ever be the foremost in the Tilts and Justs that were tobe before the King, Queen, and Princels, where he won great Applaule; after which, taking his Opportunity, he invited the Queen, and the Princess to Dinner, and so fplendidly entertained them, that they had not beheld the like in the King's Palace; and, at their Departure, gave each of them a rich Jewel, which they very readily accepted. At Andolocia's next coming to Court, the King met him, and told him, That he heard how he had entertained the Queen and Princess to their Content; saying, If he had but known of his Feast, he would have been there in Person; whereupon Andolocia excused himself, saying, he durst not presume so high as to invite his Majefty; but that if he would fo far honour him with his presence, he should be infinitely obliged to him for fo great a favour. To this the King confented, and appointed the next Day to come; whereupon Andolocia provided a more coffly Entertainment than before; infomuch that the King marvelled

F.3.

how

I.

120 Che Diffogp of Fortunatus. Part II.

how he could live at that rate: Several fires he made of Cedar, and Spices, which cast a fragrant smell, so that the King, and several of his Nobles fat down and were exceeding merry, continuing there till E. vening, and then departed: At whose Departure. Andolocia gave Money among the Guards, and humbly thanked the King for the Honour he had done him. When the King came to the Court, he told the Queen and Princess how bravely he had been entertained: and that he did not a little wonder how Andologia, having neither Lands nor Subjects to appearance, could spend so liberally: therefore he said, Ibelieve, he must be some Priest in Disquise. Truly, said the Queen, I can but wonder as well as you, and have had a longing Mind to know bow be comes by fo much Money; and of late I have bethought my self of the Means; be bas, for some time past, professed great Love to our Daughter, the which by many Symptoms, I well perceive is unfeigned, wherefore I intend to advertise her of my purpose, and if the them bim but a little Kindness, I know be will not deny ber any thing. This well pleased the King, and thereupon he ordered Agrippina to fearch out the Matter: who promised to do her utmoft therein.

Part II, The hilton of Fortunatus. 121

II.

res

aft

fe-

ex-

E. Dethe for the DSS entle her ble berulas 200 : 1 as.

our

pell

to

eD

not

he

na

to

How the Princess Agrippina came to know the Secret of the Purse. and how she deceived Andolocia of the same.

The next Morning Andolocia, coming to the Court, wasadmitted into Agrippina's Chamber, a Favour that he never before enjoyed; at which he exceedingly rejoyced, thinking with himself, that this was a happy Opportunity, and prosperous, he had not long been there before the Princess came, and with a merry Countenance, wished him a good morning, at which he humbly thanked her Grace, and then caused him to six down by her, and sell into Discourse about divers Affairs, as of his Travels Birth, and Parentage, so that in such like Discourses 122 The Diffory of Fortunatus. Part II.

they fpent much time ; then began Andologia to express the Passion he had for her, and that how for her fake, he would adventure any hazard : Alas. faid the. I am not at my own dispose; for if I were, your estate would foon decrease at the rate you live, and then' I (bould come to Poverty. Fear not that, my Love. and dearest Part of my Life, my Estate can never grow less than i: is, although I should spend a Million a Week. Then belike, faid Agrippina, your Faiber is fome puiffant Prince. Not fo, faid Andolocia, my Father is dead nor was be, neither am I, a Prince; bis Riches and mine mere equal; and tho' we have both fpent to excefs, yet have we never the less. This made Agripping wonder, and therefore the was the more defirous to know whence this infinite Treasure should flow, and began to thew better Countenance than ever, faying, You have often told me you loved me, Andolocia. And in abat, faid he, I have not faid amifs; for I protest, by all that's facred, I admire and adore you above all Womenbind, effeeming you, as indeed you are, the Fairest of your Sex; many Ladies bave I feen in foreign Courts. but your bright Perfections as far excels them all, as the the Sun doib the paler Luftre of the Moon; therefore pouchfafe, dear Lady, to cure the Wounds you have made, and pardon my Boldness. Then faid Agrippina, if it be true, that you love me as you fay pray tell me from mbense you have such abundance of Treasure? In which. mben I am better fatisfied, you may expell my Favour. but not till then. A this Andologia was almost extafied, being drunk with Love, and doating upon her Beauty, he was resolved to fatisfie her Defire, and thus began: Madam, could you but keep it fecret, I would Lay open to you all the fecrets of my Soul, and unfold what my dying Father charged me not to do, tho' at this Instant bis Ghost should rife and blast me. Nay, said Agrippina, if you loved me, you would not doubt my keeping your Secrets, but your scrupuling my Fidelity, shews you love me not. By Heaven, faid Andolocia, I do, and will reveal she secret. And thereupon, in an unlucky Hour, he drew

Part II The Piltop of Fortunatus. 123

T.

CY-

for las.

ere.

arid

ve.

WOT

ek.

mor

ine

yes

er.

OW

an

TOU

in

by

eft

15.

the re

ve

14.

278

cb.

U,

6-

er

d ld

at 1718

4,

ene

al

he

W

drew out his Purfe, faving, Here is my Exchequer, which can never be emptied; and thereupon he pulled out three hundred pieces of Gold, and gave them to Agrippina, and then the purse seeming empty, he put in his hand feveral times; faying, This can I do for many Years together, and yet can never empty this Purse during Life; this was left by my Father, and given bim by Dame Fortune, in a Wilderness, as be was travelling to fee strange Countries. Agripping having now understood what the most defired, the began to plot how the might get the purse into her possession; and therefore told Andologia, That if he would promile faithfully to marry her, he should lie with her before-hand, for that the King and Queen lodged that Night in the Sommer-house at the upper-end of the Garden, and that by bribing her chief Woman, he might be admitted into her Chamber: This made him leap for loy, promising to gain Admittance whatever it coft him; and so taking his Leave of her, with a thousand thanks for that she had vouchsafed to pity him, he departed: Then went Agripina to the King and Queen, and declar'd all that had happened, and how the had gave him hopes of enjoying her that Night, with a delign to deceive him of his The Queen commended her Wit, and ordered a Purse to be made like to that Agripping had describ'd. When they had done, they prepared a fleepy Potion, ordering the Cup-bearer to put it into the Wine that Andologia should drink; which being done to the Life, about eight in the Evening, Andologia came and enquired for the Princels's Woman, as if he had a Letter to deliver; and when he had found her, he gave her a purse with a hundred Crowns in it, telling his purpole; of which made the fomething ftrange, tho' the knew it from the Princels; yet she shut him into the Princels's chamber, where he had not stald long, before Agrippina came and bid him welcome; then the fent the Matron for two Bottles of Wine, one for Andolosia, and another:

124 The Diftoy of Fortunatus. Part II.

another for herfelf: Telling him, In Token of Love I bear you, I will drink off a full Bowl, and bope you will do the like. Now the Woman had notice to put the Drugs into that he was to drink, which she did accordingly; after Andologia had drank it off, he began to grow drowfie, fo that in a while, Agrippins and her Woman talked him faft alleep; then the sending her Woman away, turned aside his Coat, and took off the Purle, in the room of which, fhe placed a counterfeit one; and then went to the King and Queen, who with much Impatience expected her coming. She was no fooner come, but they demanded how the sped, to which the answered, I have sped as I wished; for bere, says the, is the golden Purse; and with that, putting her hand into it she pulled out feveral handfuls of Gold, at which the King and Queen greatly rejoyced: Then the King commanded her to give it into his keeping : but the Queen fald, Since foe bas ventured for it, it is but reason she should keep is. Now whilst this Discourse held. Andolocia awoke, and flarting up as one amaz'd, found that he had flept in the Chair all Night, which did not a little perplex him; when in the midft of his trouble, in came the old Woman, of whom he demanded where Agripoina was? She told him, That the having lain alone all Night, in expediation of his waking and coming to Bed to ber, the was now rifen, being very much grieved that he should so disappoint her. And farther, the told him, That although they jog-ged him, and used all their Endeavours, they could not wake him : then concluded Andolocia, it was done by the Enchantment of some that envied his happiness, and thereupon departed pensive to his boule, as having loft to happy an Opportunity; and being out of all hopes of regaining such another a but little dreamt his purfe was gone.

Part II. The hiftopy of Fortunatus. 125

CHAP. V.

How the King sent to Andologia to prepare a Dinner for him: and how, when he found his Purse was lost be lest his House in great Heaviness, and departed for Cyprus; where, when he arrived, he declared to his Brother Ampedo, all that had happened.

Ow the King being defirous to try how Anaclo-Purfe, fent his Steward to him to acquaint him, That by reason a Stranger was come to Court, he proposed to bring him to his house, and therefore willed him to provide accordingly; which Andologia promifed, as yet nothaving miffed his Purfe. After the Meffenger was gone, he called his Steward, and bid him provide for the King's Enterraigment, such things as he thought most fit; to which he replyed, My Money is spens in the late costly Banqueis, and to furnish a new one I must bave more Money. With that Andolocia put his hand into his Purse as formerly, but, to his great Amazement, found nothing in it, then began he to turn it and look upon it, and found it was not the fame: then he waxed exceeding forrowful, and much repented him of his Folly, that, contrary to his Father's Command, he had declared the secrets of his Purle; as likewise how he had been deceiv'd by a fair Woman not long before, which might have been a Warning to him how he again trufted any of that treacherous Sex; and in utter despair ever to gain it by fair Means, he called all his Servants about him, telling them, That he had heard of the Death of his Brother in Cyprus, and muft inftantly depart thicher to take possession of his Land, and therefore willed them to take what Wages was due; besides their horfes, and the furniture of the house, he would freely bestow upon them, and then leave them to hift for themselves, for that it would be too great a Trouble to carry Servants over Sea. At this sudden News they

ove I e you o put e did

, he pina

fhe ing

indsped rse; lled

and ded ild, mid

hat not led ng

ng ng er.

ne pile,

g t-

P.

126 The Pittopy of Fortunatus. Part 11

they are all dismayed, relling him, That they would venture their Lives and Fortunes with him whereever he went. But he told them it must not be. but that if ever returned to England, he would find them out, and entertain them as formerly; and fo. taking his Leave of them, he rode to the Sea, all alone, and there taking Ship departed for Cyprus. Andolocia landing in the Ifle of Cyprus. hafted to Famo. gofta, and entring the Palace, where meeting his Brother, they kindly embraced, and asked of each others Welfare; for now Ampedo thought to have his turn of the Purse: But when he beheld his Brother pensive and sad, he much doubted the event. and thereupon began to ask him. What was become of his Men? Nay, says he, as for them, I take no further Care, but am glad my felf is return'd with Life. Then Ampedo began to ask him about the Purfe ; o which he answer'd in a mournful Tone, By disobeying my Father's Comand, I have loft it. How! faid Ampedo, by Fraud or Force? Nay, faid he, by Fraud; for falling in Love with a fair Lady, ber Beauty fof ar bewitched me, that at ber Intreaty I told ber the fecret Vertue of it: infomuch, that when I was afleep, the got it from my Girdle, and placed a false one in the room of tt. 25, faid Ampedo, to be disobedient : Had it not been bet. ter for you to have staid at home, without any bazard, than thus to lose the best Treasure the World can afford? Now if we come to Poverty, shall we be the Laughing-stock and Score of all that have formerly known our manner of diving. Good Brother, faid Andologia, do not vate my Sorrow, for I grieve fufficiently, and repent me of my Folly : infomuch, that I fear it will cast me into Some dangerous Sickness of which I foall die. When Ampedo heard him fay fo, he began to leave off chiding, and ftrove to comfort him, faying, Well, fince it is loft, let is go : I bave yet three thousand Duckets left, besides the Wishing bas, for which I doubt not 10 get a a great Sum of Money, when Some puissant Prince hall know the vertue of it. CH AP.

Part II. The Diffory of Fortunatus. 127

CHAP. VI.

How Andologia deceived bis Browser, and got his Wishing has, with which be came into England, and carried away Agrippina and the Purse, into a desart place, and what there befol.

Now when Andolosis had continued a while with his Brother, he one day told him, That if he would lend him his Wishing-hat, he did not yet doubt to recover the Purse. But Ampedo would by no means consent thereto, saying, I shall be wifer than so; and the best way is to set down with the first loss; for, said he, I doubt not but to get a bundred thousand duckets for the bat, when our money is spens. So that when Andolosia perceived he would not part with it, for an English Voyage, he let him alone a good while, and then taking his opportunity, when as his Men were gone a hunting, he desired him to let him have the hat only to get amongst them, that he might see the sport. To this Ampedo consented; but Andolosia

rt II
rould herebe, find id fo

Anamohis

Broent,

fur-Life. ; 0 ying

for e of my is is bes-

Now and me into hen off

ell, and ubs

P.

128 The hiltop of Fortunatus. Part II.

Andologia had no sooner put it on, but he wished himfelf at Venice, and was infantly conveyed there through the air, where he inquired for feveral Fews who were wont to trade in rich Jewels, and defired that he might fee their Jewels; the which they confented to, in hopes of a Chapman; but Andologia had no fooner got them in his Hands, but he wished himfelf in England, and was fuddenly carried thicher, the Fews imagining him to be no other than the Devil, and bleffed themselves that they did not take any of his Mony. When he came into England, he difguiled himself in an Italian Habit, and gerting on a long Gown, went to the Court, and there pretended himself to be a Merchant; and infinuated into the Company of Agrippina's Gentlewomen, by giving them Imall Prefents, that fo they should perswade the Prince's to buy all his Jewels, which were very rich; with which they foon acquainted her, withing him to spread them abroad against she passed by, which he accordingly did; and the, cafting her Eyes upon them, asked if he would fell any of them? Yes, if it hall please your Highness, I came from a far Country for that purpose. Then the chose out several of the beft, and asked him the Price, who told her, the should have them for fix thousand Crowns; whereupon she bid bim three thousand Crowns; but he imagining that she would bring out the Purfe, bargained with her for four thouland Crowns; and then, the ordering him to bring them into her Chamber, went to a Coffer, and taking thence the Purfe, tyed it faft to her Girdle ; which was what Andologia looked for : who, whilft the was telling out the Mony, clasped her faft by the Arm, and throwing her upon his Back, he wished himfelf in a folitary Defart, and immediately they were both carried out of fight, to the great Amazement of those that beheld it, and were not set down till they came into Ireland; then Agrippina being faint, Andolocia placed her under a Tree on which were many Apples, exceeding fair to appearance, when as the made her Requeft Part II. The Piltop of Fortunatus. 129 Request to Andologia, That if he had any Pity of a poor distressed Virgin, he should get her something to quench her Thirft, or the should faint; with that he taking Pity of her, as loving her fill, although the had to mifuled him, he got up the Tree, and through carelefness, left the Hat upon her Head, and the Jewels in her Lap, who, whilft he was plucking the Apples, faid, Woe is me! bow came I bitber into shis forlorn and defars Place? O! bow unlike u this to my Father's Country, I would to God I were in my Father's Palace again. The which, when Audolocia heard, he hafted down the Tree, to flay her Flight, but the was gone, paft recovery, in a Moment with the Porfe, Hat, and lewels, which vexed Andologia worfe than before: Whereupon he began to curle the Destinies, and the Hour wherein he was born, faying, That now he was quite undone, and his Loss irreparable! When he had bewailed his Misfortune a good while, he being faint and dry, eat the Apples, upon which he felt a sudden Pain in his Head, which made him suppose they were infectious; but it continued not long, before t II.

ired conhad im-

her, Deany difon a

ded the ing the

the ch; to he

ball that im the

for to and le;

ilft the m-

of cia es,

eft

130 The history of Fortunatus. Part II

fore a large Pair of Goat's Horns forung up, at which he was fore affrighted, and would have fled from himfelf, had it been possible; and began more than before to exclaim against his hard Fate, faying, That fuch a Misfortune was befel him, as would exclude him from the Honour and Society of Men; then began he to curse the time when be first came into England, and wished that he had died in the Womb, or as soon as he ever beheld the Light; curfing and railing against the inchancing Beauty of Agrippina, which had brought him all this Difgrace and Milery; vowing, if possible, to be revenged; and was grown fo desperate, that he resolved to sell his Soul to the Devil, rather than the should go unpunished. And in this mad Mood he he ranged the Forest, for two Days space, without meeting either Man or Beaff; till at laft he came to a Cave under a spreading Oak, wherein lived an aged Hermit, who not only calmed his desperate Resolves, but likewife cur'd him of his Horns, as shall in the next Chapter be shewn at large.

CHAP. VII.

How Andolocia, by the Advice of an Hermit, was eased of his Horns; and how he came into England, and grafted a Pair of Goat's Horns upon the Head of Agripping.

When the Hermit perceived Andolosia, he came out of his Cell, and demanded what brought him into such a disconsolate and desart Place? and withal smiled when he beheld the Horns upon his licad, as well knowing what had caused them. To thom Andolosia replyed, with a doneful Tone, Truly, we brough hister by the Air, and remain here full sore mineral being Comfort, for I never intend to go to any some anless I can be rid of this Deformity, which proceeded from eating of Apples in this Wilderness. At which the old Man lawshed heartily, and the rather, to see what what piteous wry-faces Andologia made; at which andologia being somewhat displeased, told him, rou onghe rather to comfort me, than encrease my affliction. faid the Hermit, I fall comfors you, and therefore com into my boufe, and in two Hours space I'll cause thee to At this Andolocia greatly rejayeed, fred thy Horns. and told the Hermit, That if he would do lo he would give him ten crowns, Keep your mour, laid the Hermit, and corrupt not me with it; for if I had do lighted in riches, I had not come to this place. nced I now live bere. Then Andologia aske Man for fomething to eat; who brought him nuts, field-apples, and a cruile of water, which all the fare he lived on; then he defir d that he would begin to cure him of his horns; at which the Hermit went out of his Cave, and returning again about half an hour after, brought fix apples of a very fair colour with film, and wished Andologia to eat two of them a the which he had no fooner done, but his horns drop ped off, at which he was exceeding glad; and asked the Hermit, how these fruits came to be of such different

t II hich

hich himbe-That him

n he and n as inft

ible, the fhe

out to a ged

res,

yed and of me ght ind his To uly, ore and any

ich fee

132 Che Piftopp of Fortunatus. Part II.

ferent qualities? To which he answer'd. The Wife Creator, and Sovereign Lord of all Thirps bas fo disposed his Bounties, that feldom there is any thing buriful, but shere is likewife another thing to cure that burt it causes . Bus, fail be, in all the earth I believe there is not two Trees that retain the like qualities of theje. Now after they had held a long discourse about the business of the World, the Hermit bid Andolocia be mindful of the facure state of his precious and immortal Soul, fo guiding bim to the next Town, hed fmiffed him with his bleffing, and Antologia, on the other hand, returned him a thousand Thanks. Then went Andoloera to the next Ing, and called for meat and drink, and afterwards departed thence towards the Ser-fide Audring all the way how he might be reverged on Arippina; and having some of the hornifying apples in his pocker, as likewife four of the contrary quality, which the Hermit had given him, he refolv'd to go for London, and, if possible, to graft a pair of horns upon the head of Agrippina, by which means he doubted not to recover his hat and purfe; in order to which, he agreed with the Mafter of a Veffel to carry him into England; when coming to London, he disguised himselt; and so went to the. Court, and there, putting his apples into a box, he fet them forth just as the Princess was coming by: And when any one asked him what fruit they were, he told them, that they were brought from Ferusalem, and that they grew in the holy garden; which made mamy enquire the price, but he held them fo dear that none would buy; it not being his intent that any should experiment the secret; he had not long continued before Agripping come by, and caffing her eyes upon them, the not being accustomed to fee fuch kind of fruit, domanded what they were ; her Gentlewoman told her: whereupon she made towards Andolocia, and, taking one up in her hand, asked the price, which he told her was three crowns the least; For, says he, I have not above twenty, and it coft

Part IL. The Diltory of Fortunatus. 173

cost me tree lue months travel to fetch them : Some, 'tis true, I dispos'd of in the Court of Frence, where they are bigbly a proved for their versue. Well, and what vertue, faid the Princels, do they contain? Such, faid Andolocia, that if you are old, they would restore both youth and beauty; they are not only pleafant to taffe, but have fur b a miraculous fecret, that they once being exten, preferve tealsh for feven years after. But bow many? feid Agrippina. Only mo, aid Andelocia. Upon this the Princels, who was often troubled with fire, bought two of them, but wou'd give him no more than two crowns a-piece; and putting them in her handkershief departed; which did not make Andelocia a little rejorce; fo, staying about the Court, he perceived by the melancholy temper of her Waiting-gentlewoman, that the project had taken effect; for fo it was, that when the Princels came into her chamber, the eat one of the apples, and finding it had a fuscious rafte, ear, in a while afterwards, another; then lying down to fleep, as was her usual custom, the found herself somewhat indisposed, but yet flept half an hour, during which space, she dream'd that a great he-goat came running at her, and butted her with his horns, whereupon the firiving to flie, found herfelf turned into a goat alfo; at which, being much affrightned, the awoke, when, flarting up, the felt a more then usual weight upon her head; and looking in the glass, The espied a great pair of horns fixed upon her head. whereat the thricked out, fo that her Gentlewoman came running in, and when they beheld her, they shricked also; but the old Matron, who was her Tutor, being wifer than the reft, bid them keep filence; For, faid the, if this be noised abroad, the greatest Beauty upon the earth will lose bet credit amongst Men: , by she best way will be to procure able Physicians as me Then asked the of Agrippina, them away. the deemed that they happened? To w pina replied, I know not, unless is be so judzment shewed upon me for my too great after of the

Wife

Spoted

, but

aufes .

with l, reidolorink,

-fide d on

nalio go orns

ubt-

he and hem

told and ma-

any conher

fee her rds

in

134 The Pillopy of Fortunatus. Part II.

beauty, or the effects of the strange fruit I bought of the Merchant; but, however they came, I pray you feek fome means by which I may be rid of them, whatever it cost me, before it comes to be blazed about in the World. Whereupon the old Woman went to all the noted Physicians, and acquainted 'em with what had happened to a fair young Gentlewoman, but told them not her name; then many of them defired to fee her; but the told them, That might not be, unless unlight or unfeen they would promife and oblige themselves in an obligation of two thousand crowns if they performed it not; but they looking upon it as a strange and unheard of matter, would not undertake it upon fuch conditions; fo that the old Matron was returning home fad and heavy, when Andologia, who had watched her, meeting her at the turning, being now in the habit of a Doctor, with falle whiskers, and other disguises, drew near and saluted her, saying, What makes you fo fad, is not some of your Friends well? For lo I guess, because I fee you come out of a Doctor's boule. Truly, faid the, there is something more than ordinary that makes me thus. Then, faid he, be not afraid to discover it, for, by my skill, and God's bleffing. I have done miraculous cures, left off by others. When the heard him fay fo, the rejoyced, and declared to him, in all points, what had happened, (which was to him no news) and defired him to flay till the went and acquainted the Gentlewoman with it, and she would return to him in a little time: The which he promised to do, so that when the Matron returned, the enjoyned him to fecrefie, and to promife the payment of two thouland crowns if he did not perform the cure; and then the led him up, a back-way into Agrippina's chamber.

Ho

ly

the fur

84 dol

Fla

for

to cia

the

hu

cal

dr wh

Pr

pe

joy

ho

to an

th

m

the

to op

fin

hi

in

pu

Part II. The pittopy of Fortunatus. 135

CHAP. VIII.

How Andolocia, by undertaking to cure Agrippina of ber Horns first recovered his Wishing-hat, and afterwards his Purse, with what happened during the time.

Ow when Andologia was brought into Agrippiwa's presence, and beheld her horms, he inwardly rejoyced, tho' to appearance he feemed forry; then faid he, Fair Lady, be not dejetted, for I shall furely cure you of your borns. If you do, faid Agrippina. I will bountifully reward you. Fear it not, faid Andolocia; in the same case was an Bari's Daughter in Flanders, for making wows to ber Lover, and never performing them, yet I cur'd ber. Then began Agrippina to figh, as imagining her breach of faith with Andolocia might have brought upon her that difgrace; then the defired him to keep, it fecret, and so gave him a hundred crowns; upon which he went to the Apothecary's, and there, for fashion's sake, bought several drugs, with which he mixed some slices of the apples, whole quality it was to take away horns; which the Prince's taking, and they working with her, she foon perceived them to diminish; at which she greatly rejoyced. But Andolocia was resolved not quite to rid hor of them, till such time he found an opportunity to recover his former loss. A while after he cansed an ape to be killed, and wrapped the skin about them, which the patiently endured, then the took more of the apple, which made them fink fo far, that they were scarce a handful long; so he ordered her to go to fleep again: During which time, taking his oppportunity, he fearch'd about to fee if he could find the hat and purie, and had the good luck to find his hat where it was carelelly laid under the bed. Agripping not knowing the fecret vertue that remained in it: at which good hap Andologia rejoyced, and took it as a happy presage that he should recover his purse likewise; For now, said he, I will take another AITY-ored hap-

fibe

(ome her; light lives per-pon had now and

ing, vell? tor's

fing, hen to

was vent she he payorm into

P.

136 The Diltop of Fortugatus. Part II.

airy-vopage with her and the purse, to see if I can be more circumspell than formerly. Whilst he was thus debating, he; unless of the Princels, took up the had an ab

he no in

and put it under his coat; and thereupon began to de relent of the incended cruelty he defigned towards her; which was, That when her horns were almost gone, he would give her two hornifying-apples that should make them rise again larger than ever, and then to depart for France, and sent her a letter who she was, and upon what occasion her horns were, and the unless she would come and bring the purse, she should never be cured; whilst he was thus considering, Against awaked, and feeling on her brows, found they were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; and otherway were almost gone, at which she rejuyed; the part is yet remaining, which is, the taking the Room of chus. bao !

of your Skully for which I must use many costly drugs; and when that is done, you shall appear more beautiful than ever. This made her rejoyce the more, and promise him any reward he would ask a For, faid the, if this diffrace continue by me, I shall be ashamed to appear in publick. Well, faid he, as for the taking them away, I do not in the least doubt, but the drugs will cost a great deal of ming No matter for that, spare not, faid the, for what ever is coft, I care not Nay, faid he, but I brue not mony to purchase the third part of them; therefore y ur Highness must disburst five bundred crowns, for there must be many ingredients; as pearl, corral, rubies, amber greece, civet, cpopanax, galbanum, trankincense, myrrb, and orber costly skings. U son which Agripsing, not knowing whom the had to deal witha', putting on her cloaths, went to a large cibinet, in which all her treasure lay, and after the had unlicked ir, took out the fo much-defied purfe, and faffned it to her girdle, as the was wont upon the like occasion; which he noting, drew her towards the window, and there fet open the calement, faying, I am dim-fighted, and cannot well fee my mony in a dark room. Whereupon as the began to tell out the mony, he clapped on his hat, which, till then he had held under his coat; and clasping her faft, wished himself in a folicary defart; the which he no fooner had an to done, but they were hoisted up into the Air, and carwards ried invitibly over many Cities and Towns, till they knot come to a defart in sconland, where he fet her sthat down: and then, that the thould be no longer ignoand rant by what means the had been thus conveyed away who (for the thought certainly the Devil had carried her), and he pulled off his disguise, and told her plainly who he hould was a upon which the was not able to speak for a g, A good space. Now when she was carried away, her found Women were in great perplexity, some weeping, and and others tearing their hair, infomuch that their lamenfible; tations being heard, the King and Queen supposed restal the Princess was dead, for that they had notice she

011 04

138 The Piffogy of Fortunatus Part II. Pa

was fick some time before, whereupon they came into be her lodgings, and demanded the cause of such extravagant sorrow; whereupon the old Woman, with much sobbing and fighing, told them, That the sur Princels was again carried away as before, by one that it pretended himself to be a Physician, and undertook to cure her of certain horns, which by a ftrange accident grew monftroufly out at her head. At this, they were both grieved, but comforted themselves in hopes she would return as the had done before; but when feveral days were over, and the came not, they began to despair of her. Then said the King, I wish I bad never perswaded ber to bereave Andolocia of his purse, for had be kept that, we had had our Daughter; for, past doubt be is a Necromancer, or deals with such as are, and by that means has these two times convey'd her away and I am verily perswaded, that the Merchant and the Phylician were no other than be in disquise; but I well truft, that be is fo courteous, that be will do our Daughter no barm; but when he hath obliged her to return the purfe, be'll fend ber again; for it is certain, rt II. Part II. The Diff 329 of Fortunatus. 130 me into has the purse cannot be quiesly enjoyed by any one but the extra-rue Owner: therefore, were Agrippina here, I should, with for care she should be any longer troubled with it, but if I at the fould get it, I'd send it to Andologia, and excuse her de that taking is from bim. After this, the Queen urged bim o fend forth Meffengers, not only in his own Dominions, but likewise into other Kingdoms, which he commanded speedily to be done: and so departed forrowfully to his chamber, where I'll leave him, and return into Scotland to Andologia and Agrippina: When the was come to herfelf, and able to fpeak. the fell upon her knees, befeeching him to have mercy upon her : For, faid the, I must confess I have greatly pronped and abused you, for which I am bearcily forry: And it is true, it lies now in your power to revenge ourfelf; but fuch an action will be a ftain to all your rea and glorious atchievements in arms, if once it hould come to light, as most likely it will . For coninu'd the Princels, muriber is but rarely concealed long, be quilty Conscience of the Muriber, through Divins Providence, confirming bim to discover bimfelf, to bis com shame, and destruction both of Soul and Body. But this did not above his Adget, who harcely replied, Well may you blush with same and confusion of face, suce you have so treaster outly deals with one, who loved you beyond all earthly things, discounting to you that server, which all the racks and sortures in the World could never have exported from me: Tremble therefore as your inceit, for fee revenge is mostion on my bien; and

G

fe

thereupon he laid his hand on his Sword, which the perceiving, and expeding nothing less than death, the, through fear and grief, fell into a fwood, which moved him to pity, to that he gently raifed her up from the ground, and the recovering, began to intreat him to compassion. Pity you! faid Anaglotia.

what pity can there remain in my breaft for One who fo treacherously and ungratefully bath abused me for all the bazards that I underwent for your fate? But know, I, in compassion of your sex, and for the former ok to ident Were s fhe fevein to 1 bad purfe. past are. may :

d the well our

0 76tain, 1641

love I bore you, spare your life, you shall always was the infany on your fore-bead, as an everlasting man of your insidelity. Then said Agrippina, I desire yo to place me in some Nunnery, to keep me from the known ledge and sight of all People. To which request of her Andologia willingly contented.

h

th

W th

0 d

h

n

t

CHAP. IX.

How Andolocis pus Agrippina in a Numery, and de parted with his Has and Purse, so the City of Famo gosta, so his Brother Ampedo; and how, as the Request of the King of Cyprus, he freed Agrippina ou of the Numery, and sook away her Horns.

A Molocia having found a Ninnery, knocked at the door, and defired to speak with the Matron, who, after some time, came and demanded his business; and he rold her, That he would gladly speak with her in private, whereupon she took him by the hand, and led him into the lodge, where he rold her, That a strange accident had happened to a Lady of great birth and beauty, which was, that she had

Part II. The Difforp of Fortunatus

had two horns growing out of her head; upon that the Matron wonder'd, and was defirous to fee her ? Wherespon he fetched Agrippina, who was not fac thence; when he brought her, the Abbels wondered more, but did not feem to take any notice, for feat of displeasing her, but went and embraced, her bidding her heartily welcome, perceiving the had been well educated: Then did the demand of Andologia two hundred crowns, which was the custom of the Nunnery, when any Lady first entered ; and afterwards they had Servants to wait upon them. Upon this he & v: her three hundred crowns, faying, There's a bundred more than you ask; therefore let ber be carefully look'd soo; which the Matron promifed. Now Andolocia being rid of Agrippina, he departed joyfully with his purfe and bat; and, being out of fight, wished himfelf in Flanders, whither he was conveyed in a trice ; and there foliating himself in pleasure, he fell in love with the Earl's Daughter, to whom he imparted the the fecret of his har, which she intended to steal by night: But he having notice of it from one of her Virgins, to whom she had revealed it, by reason of his liberality to her, took the opportunity to prevent her, by wishing himself in Cyprus; where he no sooner arriv'd, but he hired Servants, bought horfes, and then rode to Famogoffa; which when he approached, his Brother Ampedo espying him from the battlements of his Palace, he did not a little rejoyce; and withal, called to his Servants to make ready his horfes, and fo rode to meet him; when they came pear each other, both of them alighted and embraced, neither for a while, being able to speak for joy ; after which, Ampedo asked Andologia bow he sped ; who, with a chearful countenance replyed, I bave recover'd my purse again; which did not a little glad Ampedo. After having much discourse relating to his travels, they came to the Palace where Ampedo ordered a teaft to be prepared, to welcome his Broeys was

of her

Famo the Re ina on ed ace Maanded gladly k him ere he

t the

742 The Wiffor of Fortunatus, Part II

ther : to which they invited feveral of their Friends. to rejevee with them, and continued in great merriment for two days: at the end of which Andologia offered his Brother the purfe, but he refused it, faying. I bave enough; and it caufeth great perplexity to bim that bath it; and therefore he willed Andologia Aill tofretain it which did not at all displease him ; for altho' he offered it his Brother, yet he was in hopes that he would not accept of it. When he had revelled In the Palace for a while, he took leave of his Brother, and went to the King's Court, where he no fooner arrived, but the King had notice thereof, and fent one of his Chamberlains to bring him to his prefence; where when he was come, he made a low obaifance, after which the King welcomed him asking of his travels, of which he gave an account, relating to the customs and fashions of the Countries through which he paffed: Then the King demanded of him. whether he had been in the English Court: to which he replyed, I have. And have you, faid the King, feen the Princel's Agrippina? I bave, faid Andolocia. But do you know whether the be found or no, fince the news came that he was carried away by Necromancy? For I have a great mind to lay down the pondrous weight of Government, if I could match my Son to that Princels. Truly, faid Andologia, I must confess I know where she is; and if your Majefty will fend an Ambaffedor with the Prime's Pidure, I will fo order it, that the fhall be at her Father's Court before the Ambaffador arrives. At this the King rejoyced, and highly honcured him, promifing all things should be done according to his directions; and defired him to make good his word without delay. Upon which he took his leave; and, being a mile from the Palace, put on his Wishing-har, and was immediately at the Nunnery, where, knocking as the gare, he defired to speak with the Matron, who no looner came to him, but he shewed her who he was; whereupon Agrippina was called, 'and knowing bim, could not refrain weeping; whereupon, Part II. The Diftop of Fortunatus. 143 upon, taking her by the hand he led her into a private chamber, and told her. That he had ranged the World about, to find medicines to cure her; demanding, If the were cured, where the would with herself to be? Wby, said she, with my Father, to en-joy my freedom in his Palace. Then said be, Be is acsording to thy Wife; and thereupon he gave her two apples, which he had referved the which the no fooner eat, but fled her borns : then he called the Matron. and told her, That Agripping was a King's Daughter, and that e're long the should be married to a beautiful young Prince; and that he having cored her of her horns, did now intend to take her with him. The Abbels perceiving the wonderful change, greatly rejoyced, and praised God that had wrought such a miraculous Alteration : Then giving the Abbels two hundred crowns more, and to Agrippina's Waitingmaid a hundred, he departed with her; and when he was come into a Forest, he pur on his Wishing-hat, and taking her in his Arms, wished himself in London, where he immediately arrived, and there, fetting down the Princels, without a word speaking, wished himself at Famogosta, and was there in a trice, riends.

merri-

dolocia

t, fay-

xity to n; for hopes

relled

Bro-

e no

and pre-

low

king

tring

ugh

him.

hich

log,

ocia

the

TCY ?

ight

ess.

fhe

l be

At

m.

his ord

d, ar,

2-

er

nd

יים

a,

CHAP. XI.

Now Arripoina perceiving the was in London, enquir'd the way to the Court, where the foon arrived, by the directions of the Citizens.

How Ampedo going in search of Adventures to get him Fame, rescued Almia, a beauciful Lady from two Saytyrs that had carried her into a Wood, and were about to ravish her; how he was highly feasted and rewarded by her Father, and how she fell desperately in Love with him.

During these transactions of Andologia, Ampedo desirous to try some adventures to get him hame, being bravely mounted, and richly attired, rode so far that he came to a huge dark grove, so G 3

144 COCDINORD OF Bordenstus, Part H.

21

So

M

b

f

bt

shaded with lefty trees, that the sun-beams cou'd nor penetrate it, to dispel the gloomy shades; here finding his way stopped, because there was no beated road ley through it, he alighted and tyed his norse to a tree, reposed his weary body on the verdant grass, retreshing himself at a purling stream that iffued from a rock hard by, and the evening coming on, he thought here to stay till the Sun's bright chariot had regained the Eastern skies to make the dewy earth smile with its morning-rays, in hopes that some Passengers, better knowing of the Country than himself, might come by, to direct him in his way to the next City: But scarce had he closed his eyes e're he was awaked by the loud neighing of his horse, who was broke lose, at a frightful shape, of which Ampedo had a glimps, which made him start up and follow his horse, who was get into the Wood, and so far he enter'd, that he heard a pi cous cry, as of a Woman greatly bewailing herself; towards which he made, and under a thick tust of trees, beheld two Sayters

Part II. The pittoy of Fortunatus 145

Sayters or wild Men, very dreadful to behold, drag-

Cave.

t H.

nor find-

rated

norfe

dant

at if-ning

cha-

ewy

ome

-min

the e he who

fo

he

to

18

This fight to moved Ampede's heart, that he refolv'd to refene fo-much injur'd Beauty from those Monfters, though at the hazard of his life; and thereupon drawing his fword, he flew upon them with great marage; and ere they wild recover their mighty clubs, deeply wounded one of them, to that he roared our like a lion, and then both of them came at him with great fury, giving him mighty fitakes, rill as length he run one of them quite through, forther falling dead ar his feet, the other being likewife grievoully wounded; fled amough the the thickets with fuch speed that Ampedo pursued him in vain; and fearing further danger in that vaft forest by wild beafts, or other ways might befal the Lady, he returned to her, and found her (by the fright) fall into a fwoon, whereupon he rook her in his arms, and carried her out of the forest, when, eafily fetting her down by a fiream side, he fprinkled water in her face, chafed her temples, and used such other means that the began to open her heavenly eves and feeing herfelf fafe in the arms of her Deliverer, was over-joyed, giving him infinite thanks for Living her honour from the brutal luft of those incarnate Devils, who, she said, had took her as she was walking in her Father's park, and hurried her to this difmal place, to use her as they had done many Virgins and Matrons in a vile and beaftial manuer : intreating him to conduct her to her Father's house. who would highly welcome him for fo great a ferwice.

To this he no fooner confented, but his hofre came neighing out of the wood, on which he fer the Lady, and by her guidance arrived in a few hours at the flarely palace of Languis, Lord of that part of the Country, who was her Father; her lafe arrival turning the forrow of the Family for her ablence in-

G 4.

146 The Dille of Fortunatus. Part II.

to joy: And when the good old Lord understood from his Dangtter, our of what great danger Ampedo had rescued her, he, with tears of joy, welcomed and embraced him, making great feathing;

and caused his Steward to bring him a purse of gold, as a reward of his virtuous fervice.

and to the part of the toring of escaling for her ablence ich

During thefe entertainments, Almira, (for fo was the Lady's name) fixing her eyes on the manly beausy and comly perionage of Ampedo, descerately fell in love with him, thewing such tigos and tokens of her filent affection, as the well hoped he would perceive them; but his mind being otherways bent, he reparded not what rhoulands would have rejoyced to have been happy in; and though the used all means to delay him, yet intent upon his travels, after a kind leave taken, he departed, to her great forrow of heartened was a the Difton Cortunatus, 147

CHAP. XII.

food

Am

well

ing;

25

uni

er

e

-0

12 a

IJ

How Ampedo travelling in a defolate Valley, was betraid into a Caftle by a Drum, of the Danger be was in; and bow Almira appeared to bim, but ber Cours. (bip was refused; of a terrible Combas be bad, and bow be flew the Gians, and escaped.

Mpede, as you have heard, leaving the fair Almira over-whelmed with grief at his departure, rode cross the Country so far, that he enseced a valley incompassed with steep rocks, crowned with woods, which had so many lonesome windings, that be found himself intangled in it; and heard the horrible roaring of wild beafts that haunted those rocks and lonesome woods which Somewhat flartled him, thinking now if he had the wishing hat it would stand him in stead: but whilst he was in these cogitations, and alighted to fit down and expect some Traveller to guide him, and that his horse might feed, he heard the noise of a G 5 drum-

Fortunatus. Part II. drum, when looking about, he perceiv'd a beautiful Youth beating on it, and feveral Wood Men, with clubs, dancing and capeting after him a and no fooner came he where Ampedo far, but he found himfelf by a ftrange impulse, obliged to arise from his feat, and do the like, till he came to a caftle, flanding on a fleep rock, into which the Drummer enter'd, and he, with the reff, followed in; when immediately the gates were closed on them, and they led into a buge arched vault, where many lamps were burning before certain tombs; and no fooner were they here inclosed, but the drum ceased, and the Drummer vanish'd from their fight; so that new having time to confider, they gazed long upon each other, without being able to fpeak for a time; till at laft Ampedo breaking Alence, demanded of the reft, if they could inform him were they were, or what the intent of their being thus that up meant? But they pleaded ignorance, laying, As they were letting tiles to take wild beafts, they heard the found as he had done, and were compelled to follow it.

m

La

kn

W

to fh

th

W

ni

h:

to

Te

ות

th

Te

ig

tì

in

b

W

la

ft

ta

21

n

to

Scarcely had they time to view their subterranean manfion, but the doors, before sloled, flew open, and a horrible cry was heard; which much amized Ampedo, as looking that some mischief would now befal him, when immediately rufted in a dragon and a lion fighting, with terrible roaring and howing, till the lion overcoming the dragon, he run into a low deep cave, and there conceal'd himfelf and the lion, proud of the victory, marched out the fame way he came : which, though it much aftoniffied them, fearing yet to fall into greater danger, they attempted to rush out, and make their escapes, of politible; but were met by a mighty Giant, who feiz'd and bound 'em, cauling his Servants to convey 'em to several Apartments, when Ampedo, being put into a room that was darkned, found a firong dif. polition in himfelf to fleep, and lying down upon a couch he found there, was foon awaked by melodious

Part II. The Difford of Fortunatus, 149 musick, and saw the room enlighten'd, and a fair Lady sitting by him, on whom fixing his eyes, he knew to be Almira, she whom he had rescued in the Wood, who had procured an Inchanter to being him to this place and fray him till her arrival-

H.

tifal

with 100 im-

his

and-

d, ate-

otei

m-

hey

ım-

ing

ner,

Iaft

fif

the

But

ing

he

4 et

W

nd

g,

OI

red

he

H-

t, s, o y

r.

13

This fight ftrangely amazed Ampedo, who fuppos'd the had by the fame chance been brought a Priloner thither, as himfelf had been, began to pity her : but, when laying afide her former modefty, and beginning to pour out her love-expressions, he knew it had happened by her means, using many perswations to intreat her to be otherwise satisfied, for he was resolved not to marry, but when the used many argunients, and finding all perfusions in vain, for anger that the had discovered her love, to be refused, the resolved upon revenge; which Aspelo well perceiving, took an opportunity, by flding down a rope thre a window, to get out of the calle; but brief in his flight purfired by the Giant, a terrible comba wounded; but in the end the Gient fainting then lais of Blood, fell down, being intercepted as be freger'd back, by a huge from, of which Ampelo taking the advantage, flood upon, and with his fword fleuck off his monthrous head. This being feen by Almira, the difguis'd herfelf in the habit of a Page, and fled the back-way: Then Ampedo returning, enter'd and fet the Priloners at liberty, giving them the spoils of the caftle, he departed, and in his way met his Brother Andolocis, who was in fearch of hims telling him all that had happened.

CHAR

150 Le Diltopp of Fortunatus. Part Il.

CHAP. XIII.

How Andolocia and Ampedo travelling thro' a desolate Valley, were met by Almira, in the Disguise of a Page with Ampedo's Horse; how, by the counterfeit Wailings of an old Man, Ampedo was drawn into an Ambush, and carried forcibly away, and what befel him at his Fourney's end.

A Ndolecia rejoycing he had found his Brother, and that he had escaped such danger, told him all that had past between him and Agrippina, since he last lest him, bidding him ever beware of Womens love, that so often turns into hatred and revenge, for then it is most deadly. And passing on, one habited like a Page met them with Ampedo's horse he lest in the valley when he was compell'd to the casse, and presented it to him, saying, Noble Sir, here is your Suced again, which I see you leave, when you less this place; which, for fear it should stray, or be taken away by Robbers, I have kept till this time,

Part II. The Diftop of Fortunatus. 151

II.

ate

f a

nto

fel

er,

old .

114

of

nd

on.

io's

n,q ble

ve,

AY,

me,

. Shund

in bopes of your return; Ampedo kindly thanked the Youth, and defired to know what he fhould give him. as a reward of his Courtefie: To which he replied. Noble Sir, I defire no Reward, but am sufficiently requited, in having done you service : All that I further require, is, that I may be permitted to guide you fate out of this dangereus and unfrequented Place. The two B ethren admiring the Court fie of the Youth, who appeared very beautiful, accepted the Proffer, with many kind Expressions, and Returns of Thanks; and forunning before, he led them through many By-windings and Paffages, rill they heard one amongst the Thickets complaining, and making pitcous moan, as in great Diffres; which cauled Ampedo to roth into the Forrett, to learn what it might meap, whilft Andologia flood on his Guard.

Ampedo entring about a hundred pares, found an aged Man fitting on the Ground, weeping abundantly, of whom he demanded the cause of his great Sorrow; O Sir, faid he, I am the most miscrable of all Creatures, for having but one only Daughter, the Staff of my Life, and the Comfort of my aged years, as I travelled unadvifedly, this way, with her to fee an Uncle the has that lives in a Cafile not far from hence, the was taken from me by a certain number of Out-laws, who have carried her away to use violence to her Chaftity, as I suppose, and left me sorely wounded in firving to defend her. Ampedo being herear moved with Compassion, comforted him in the best manner, alighting to succour him, who seemed to faint away ; but he no foouer flooped down to raise him from the Ground, but the old Man leaped up, catched him faftabout the Neck, and fent forth dr petent tot , and have of the little dies to and Arman all the time

immediately by the Care Dages conduced national aid.

132 The hillop of Fortunatus. Part II.

This was no fooner done, but vine or ten Men ruffied in upon him, threw him to the Ground, and bound his hands with Cords, clapping Daggers to his Breaft, and swearing to kill him if he firuggled, and did not hafte along with them. Ampedo seing himself unluckily surprized, and in danger of Death, found himself constrained by Necessity to comply, and so they carried him a tedious way through the Thickets to the other side of the Forrest, where their horses stood ready, and there mounting him, carried him by swift riding over Rocks and Hills to another great Forrest, where they continued till it was dark, and having refreshed themselves, set forward again to a large house, and e're Day-light, put him into Chains in a ftrong Prifon.

Andologia baving heard the noise and builte, and immediately missing the Page, concluded there was Treachery towards his Brother; whereupon he spurred forth his Horse to assist him; but during the Scuttle.

Part II The Diffey of Formmaris 1421

1

n

d zi

d

1-

d ò

13

S

35

d

03 as r-

he

2,

Scuffle, he was ftopt in a narrow passage by a Min of a huge stature, who rushed our with a Lion in a Chain, who seared herribly, and slying on Andoiocia's horse, so territy'd him, that he stounced back, and in spight of his Rider, ran away with him, that e'er he could stop him, he was out of the defolate Valley; but having recovered himself, and turned again, he went in search of his Brother, vowing never to give o'er til he sound him? In which, for a time, I must leave him, and seturn to Ampedo in Prison.

CHAP. XV.

How Ampedo was impison'd by the Committance of Almira; how she treated him with Threats and Promises to yield to her Love; how her Steward lay with her in his stead, and was hang'd upon her declaring te foreibly ravished her a and how Ampedo's Life was faved by Andologia his Brother.

A Medo being again in ftrong Durances his Mind to strangely run on the Page that had met bind in 154 Che hiltory of Fortunatus. Part II.

in the Valley, that calling to mind his particular Features, he could not imagine it was any other than Almira in Disguise, who had put this Trick upon him, that she might still perfecte him for his Love, which made him conceive the greater Dislike of one, from whom he had deserv'd better usage; and in this he was not mistaken, greatly complaining of Dame Fornme, that she had, contrary to her wonted Favours, thus abandoned him to Misery, and the danger of losing his Life; imputing it to his Negligence, in undertaking happily his Travels, and forgetting to bring his Wishing-hat with him, which might have stood him in much flead at a time of Necessity.

Whilft he was musing in these Cogitations, he heard a Key turn in the Door of his Prison, and upon this, flarting up, he perceiv'd, by a glimmering Light, two Persons coming towards him in Disguise, which somewhat affrighted him, suspecting they were fent to merther him; but foon recalling his Courage, and putting a good Face on, to expect the work that might happen; one of them, without laying one Word, rook off his Chains, and then both taking him by the Hand, led him through a great many dark Windings, to a Room furnished with Tapors, that burnt blew, as if Ghoffs had haunted it, calling but a faint glimmering Light, where he found a Banquer prepared, and leveral Persons disguisd, as the former; and one of them whom he concluded to be a Woman by her Voice, bid him fit down and refresh himself, after his tedious Travel and Detaioment; This gave him a Dawn of better Hopes than he had before, and Hunger perfuading him, he took the Offer, and refreshed his empty Stomach Plentifully And though he asked some Questions, as, Where h s? What was defign'd to be done to him? They only nodded, and answered with Silence which made him the more wonder where this might end : But having all raken a plentiful Repaft, upon a Signal given, they retired, unless those that brought him this ther,

I

f

E

h

he

he

D

ha

ge

an per ch

wa

Part II. The biltopy of Fortunatus. 135

ther, who, upon their discovering themselves, he found to be Almira and the old Man he had seen in the Forrest; and she first breaking silence, said, You see in what a Condition you are and if you remain obstinate, assure yourself, your Life is but of a short Date: nothing, but granting your Love, can save it: For one way or other I will put an end to the tormenting Pain that afficts me; and in vain it will be for you to hope to escape my hands.

1-

h

n

5

.

18

5 1-

g

90 p-

g

c, re

c,

A

ne og

m-

he

be đ):

it:

110

the

ade

ha-

gi-

hi

er.

Ampedo hearing this, and plainly finding who had brought him into this ftraight, pauled a while, and then humbly belought her, he might have fome time to deliberate and confider, how he might dispence with his Vow of Chaftity to pleasure her: She, upon this, thinking he would yield to her Defires, allowed him two Days, and so left him, and sent her Steward to him at Night, with Provisions, and a rich Carpet to ive on : This Man, who had a great defire for the Lady, by some Whisperings he had heard, suspecting something more than ordinary, was thereupon very inquisitive to know of Ampedo how he came thither, and for what he was confin'd; promifing also to be a Friend to him, if he told him the Truth: Which, with some difficulty, he did in hopes he might further his Escape: And after some further Discourfe, it was contriv'd between 'em, that Ampedo should promise Almira to enjoy her privately the next Evening, for the greater Secrecy, and he would take his place in her Bed, and doubted not so well to please her, as to wear her Affections from him, and gain her Good-liking to marry her, and fo foon work his Delivery : Ampedo, who was always virruous, could hardly be brought to confent to this: but the dinger he was in, and the Hopes of Liberty prevailed and the next Evening Almita having notice, that Ampedo yielded to her Request, the Steward who had chang'd Habits with him, and flayed in the Prison, was in the dark brought to her Bed, and enjoyed her delicate foft Body in his willing Alms, fo long, that he 156 Che Diffor of Fortunatus. Part H.

he forgot ro rife fo carly as was agreed: When the, fird awaking, in Expediation of a further kind Embrace from her dear Ampedo, and looking wishfully in the Face of the Sreward, her Rage was fo great, that had the had a Weapon ready, he had never awoke mere: when, clothing herfelf, the was going for a Weapon of Execution, as he waked with the Stir she made: who feelog her Eyes all flaming, and how much the was offended, leaped out of the Bed, and on his Knees begg'd her Pardon, but all in vain, for making an Out-cry, and her Father, with many Servants, coming in, the declared he had come into her Chamber, and ravilhed her : the Posture he was in, made her Pather believe there was Truth in it : and he thinking to extenua te his Crime, by according innocent Ampedo in fetting him on work, and telling all that he had told him of her Love, and defire to lye with him: This for much insenfed the angry Lady. that her Love to Ampedo, who had betrayed her Secrets, turning into an unfaciable Thirft of Revenge, the never left, till her Father had doom'd 'em to dye for the repairing her blafted Honout: and that it might be done the privater, and make the less Noise, they were convey'd early in the Morning to the next Wood, there to be hang'd distant from each other : bat to fortune orden'die, that the fulle Steward, who had devis'd and wrought this Mischief, being first exocuted, Amedo's time was delayed, till Andolocia, who had travelled far in Search of him, came by, and feeing his Brother in the Handy of the Hangman, without examining the Caufe, drew out his Sword, and fell upon them with fuch Violence, that he wounded feveral of them; and foon made them all scatter and fly for their Lives : then taking Ampada down from the Gibbet, where he was half frrangled : with rubbing and chaffing, and fome Cordials he had about him, recovered his Senfes, and mounting him behind him, rod away with all fpeed. Almira hearing of the Relcue of Ampedo, and fearing he might

Ve

Part IL Che billion of Fortunatus. 157 might deery her Wickedness to the World, she so vexed and tormented herself, that she grew distracted, and dyed raving mad.

e,

10

ly t,

te

he

W

be

or

er 0. nd n-:11 Ye Y. -30 e. ye is ife: TE r: ho cx-14. by, an,

rd.

ha

all

346 ed :

he

ing

he

ght

CHAP XV.

How the Princess Agrippina came again to the King and Queen: How an Ambassador came from Cyprus and demanded ber in Marriage to the Prince of Cyprus; and what Sports and Pastimes was ordained to grace the Weading; and how Andolocia won the Praise, which saused the Nobility to envy him.

A Grippine no fooner arrived at the Palace, but the ewas met by some of the Ludies that foomerly waited upon her, who could not speak for Joy, but immediately run to the King and Queen to instorm them what they had seen; upon which the King ordered a hundred pieces of Gold to be given to the first Bringer of the News: and immediately went to meet derapine, greatly rejoycing, that he had recovered her; upon which Occasion he proclaimed a great great Feaft throughout all the Kingdom, which was kept with great rejoycing : In the midftof which, an Ambaffador came from Cyprus, of which the King having Notice, caused him to be nobly entertained, and the next Day was introduced to his Audience, he being attended with many Nobles of Cypus : When he came into the King's presence, he declared his Ambaffy, and delivered his Mafter's Letters, flewing, likewife, the young Prince's Picture, which greatly pleased the King and Queen; then was the Pidure ordered to be carried to Agrippine, as likewife the Relation of what had paffed : the which. when the beheld, the at first, with feigned Modesty, disapproved of but talling to mind what Andologia had faid, the confested :) Then were the King's thins made ready, and a great Number of Noble Ladies appointed to wait upon her in her Voyage to Crown : When taking leave of the King and Queen, her Father and Mother, the departed, tho not without lome Tears on all fides: To having a profperous Gale, withtwo Months they handed in that Island: whereof Notice being had, the King, his Queen, and all the obles of that Kingdom, came to welcome her on re with all manner of Mofick, and whatever could invented to entertain one of fuch Noble Birth : all e People rejoycing that they had to fair a Princels to be hereafter their Queen. Then did they conduct her to the City of Meanla, where the King's Palace was against whose coming a stately Banquet was prepared; and the more to delight the Company, a Conjurer caused a Tree to grow on the Table, and a hunting to pals along for their Divertisement. Likewife Andologia attended, but would by no Means take any Norice of Aprippina, for to it was fecretly agreed between them; but he fpent fo royally, that the Nobility envy'd him by reason he eclipsed their Honours, in doing to far beyond their Abilities, in giving the Prince and Princels a Profest of Jewels worth

158 The Diftop of Fortunetus Part II

T

in 21

D

ti

in

to

W

hi

he

Part II. The Distroy of Fortunatus. 159 worth ten thousand Crowns; as likewise sending in such Store of choice Viands and Wine, that the King greatly marvelled, During the Feast, the King ordained several Sports, as Tiles, Tur-

ID

was

.an ha-

red.

nce, us : red ewich the kech, fly, cia ips lies us : Fame thcof the ao uld all els

Bu

a Če

vàs

da ke-

ans

tly

hat

eir'

eis th

naments, and fighting at Barriers: wherein didolocis so far prevailed, that he won the Praise of all the Ladies and Gentlewomen, and was, by the Princest Agrippina, often crowned with Garlands; which raised the Envy of many great Ones against him, insomuch, that two Earlands viz, the Earl of Limsse, and the Earl of Armandalia, secretly conspir'd his Death, because he had obtained the Wreath several times, by purting them to the Foil; so that they laying wait for him in a large Wood, thro' which he was to pass, (for at that time, he had not brought the Wishing-hat) resolved to kill all his Men, and putting him upon the rack, obliged him to consess from whence he had such store of treasure: Whereupon, the day before

160. The Distory of Fortunatus: Part II.

fore the feast ended, they took their leave of the King as if they intended to go a hunting; and, having got about two hundred armed Men, they placed themselves behind certain trees in the Wood, near to the way he was to pase, and furiously setting upon him, at unawares, they killed all his Meu, which were but six in number, and took him Prisoner, though not without loss on their side, for Andologia, drawing his sword, so that about him, that he killed ten of their liter, and wounded the Earl of Limese.

CHAP. XVI.

How Andologia was imprisoned and Racked; bow Ampedo harded his Wishing-bat; bow see Mursber of Andologia was differented by the two Earls falling out; literate their Execution on the Wheel.

THen the two Earls had taken Andolocia Pri-Lanet, they carried him to a Caftle of theirs, nor far from thence, where they put him into a dark ptilon, and rede again to Court, carrying with them for bocks, which they pretended to have taken by hunting. Good after their arrival, news was brought of the death of Andologia's Men, and how that he was thought to be taken Priloner, by realon his body was not found among ft them : Upon which, the King was exceeding angry, and immediately fent out Meflengers into all parts of the Kingdom, to hear of him. So likewife Ampedo offered two thousand duckets to any one that could discover where he was But when no tydings could be had where he was, he supposed him dead, or in some dismal prison, for the fake of his purfe ; and thereupon, left he should come to some ill end, by reason of his bar, he cast it into the fire, and there let it confume to after; and for grief, within a short time after died. Now when the Barls had been at the Court fome time, the Barl of Limels, went to fee what was become of Andolocia, and at his arrival, found him in the prison where he left

King g got fel ves way at unout fix withg bis their

rt II.

Amer of alling

Priheirs, dark them aken Was how calon hich. fent bear ifand Wass, he r the come into for when

for bis purje.

Barl locia, e he left

left him, and there began to examine him where he had so much mony to speed at the race he did? He told him, That if he would let him go to the Palace at Famogosta, he would shew him by what means he obtained his riches; but he would not conf-nt to it, but caused him grievously to be racked; infomuch, that he was obliged to discover the feeret of his purfe, and to deliver it to the Barl, in hopes by that means, to be fer free ; but he, having proved it, left him in prison, and rode to his Companion. and shewed him all that had happened; whereupon they, after fome contest, agreed to keep it monthly by turns; then the Earl of Armandalia faid, I bear abat Andolocia is a Neconomancer, and can fie in the air, therefore we sautet be fafe till be is difparched out of the way. To which they both agreed, and the Exrl of Armandalia rode to the Prilon and offered the Keeper two hundred crowns to frangle And cia; but he refuled it, flying, the's a just and bonest Man. Whoreupon the Earl went in himself, and after having asked, whether he had any more purses of the same fort, and he affirming he had none, the Earl, with his girdle, ftrangled him, as he fet fast bound in a pair of flocks ; and fo returned unto the Earl of Limofe to acquaint him with what he had done. Now Andologia and Ampedo being both dead, the purse lost all its vertue, and would weld no more mony than any other purle; to that it falling to the Earl of Armandalia's turn, he taxed the Earl of Limele as a Cheat, laying, You bave cha ged it; fo that there happened a dispute between hem ; whereupon they drew their Swords and wounded each other; when, People coming into part 'em, the Barl of Limofe faid, Ab Villain ! thou wouldst have muribered me, as thou didst Andolocia

Which words being told to the King, and he greatly suspecting them to be the Murcherers, thereupon commanded they should be apprehended Lacked?

162 Che Billop of Fortunatus, Part II

racked ; during which, they freely confessed all that had paffed, and were condemned to be broken upon the Wheel, their Chattels and Goods to be spoiled; iny as were contenting, or privy to the in exection. After which, by reason And in it infinite Wealth, placing the Prince and Princels therein, who lived there in gr a: fplenthe Rule of the whole Kingdom.

wierengen they grew their Sweet and pla Romer Ma in solventing Labora applications and the

CBSZ 81 4

problem and a selection of the FINIS.

Day a samulation a solo that pon led;

the ord-An-Pa-reof, ince pleg-her